Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, if Americans have a civic religion it is our belief that science and technology is the answer to many of our problems. Just think about it, Mr. President. Think about the obstacles to America's greatness that have been overcome or beaten by technology: The steam engine, the telephone, the telegraph, all enabled us to overcome the vast dimensions of this great continent to build a single Nation, an economic superpower out of an enormous, vast expanse of land.

Decades later, the discovery of the atom bomb helped put an end to World War II and established us as a global superpower.

From the victory of the electric light over darkness, to the triumph of the Salk vaccine over polio, to the success of the Apollo rockets reaching the Moon, Americans have employed a wide range of technologies to overcome a wide range of challenges through the years. Now, Mr. President, the time has come to apply this same commitment to scientific research and technological innovation.

The battle against the most significant domestic social problem and national security threat facing this country, in my view, is the drug trade.

The ideal of harnessing high technology to combat drug traffickers is not far-fetched. On March 20 of this year I chaired a Judiciary hearing attended by and participated in by Senator COHEN of the Armed Services Committee in which some of the leading scientists of the country previewed their work on advanced counterdrug technologies.

Scientists at Los Alamos National Laboratory are investing in and investigating how lasers can be used to detect remote cocaine processing sites in the Andean jungles, bringing star wars technology to the drug war.

Experts at the Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency, the research arm of the Pentagon, are examining whether super sensors can be used to detect the chemical smell of cocaine in the millions and millions of tons of cargo which are brought into this country every year.

Computer scientists at the FBI are beginning to apply the most powerful supercomputers and artificial intelligence systems ever developed to target the largest international drug trafficking rings.

These are just some of the promising new technologies that may be harnessed in the war on drugs over the next several years. I stress "may" Mr. President, because unfortunately while scientists in the lab have been doing their job to find new technologies to combat drug traffickers, we here in Washington have not been doing our job to adequately support this research.

As a result, much of this promising research remains on the drawing board and may never make it to the front lines in this important battle. The administration's most recent national drug strategy calls for investing only $46 million into research and development for new drug fighting technologies.

The leading corporate executives tell us, Mr. President, that a company should invest at least 10 percent of its budget in research and development. The Pentagon pursues a similar commitment to R&D efforts, and yet less than two-thirds of 1 percent of the Federal drug enforcement budget goes to research and development.

Last year we spent more than 100 times that amount on researching the strategic defense initiative, so-called star wars.

In pursuing star wars we have pursued something that is somewhat illusive and arguably positive. But in pursuing star wars more than finding new weapons to fight international drug wars, it seems to me our priorities are a little backward.

I think that is why an alternative national drug strategy that I released earlier this year should have, and did in fact, include proposing a funding of a full-scale national commitment to developing new technologies to combat drug dealers. This proposal was prompted largely from conversations I had with my colleague, Senator WILLIAM COHEN, whose idea this was and who suggested that the possibilities were vast. He came to me approximately 1 year ago and urged we work together in exploring the promise of high technology weapons in the fight against drug trafficking.

The bill that Senator COHEN and I are introducing today is a culmination of that joint effort. It is designed to commit this country to a major counter-narcotics research and development effort.

Specifically, this legislation will:

Establish a single, unified Counter-Narcotics Technology Assessment Center [CONTAC] in the Drug Director's office to direct and coordinate a national drug enforcement technology research and development effort;

This new Center, headed by a chief scientist with expertise relevant technologies, will have the statutory authority to establish counter-narcotics research and development priorities;

The Center will also have line-item budget authority to ensure that the most promising technologies are fully exploited by U.S. drug enforcement agencies; and

Finally, the bill boosts Federal counter-drug research and development spending to $150 million—three times the current level.

Many of the most promising technologies have already been developed by the Pentagon over the past 10 years for military purposes. U.S. taxpayers have already footed the bill for this research; now it's time to adapt these innovations to our fight against drugs.

In closing, I want to make two observations.

First, although these technologies offer incredible promise, they also raise important questions about privacy and civil liberties issues. Senator COHEN and I raised these concerns during the Judiciary Committee hearing on high technology antidrug weapons, and we will continue to look very closely at these issues during our consideration of this bill.

Second, I want to tell my colleagues and the public that these new weapons, by thesmelves, won't win the fight against drugs.

New weapons to fight drug traffickers are no substitute for comprehensive drug education in our school and adequate treatment slots for drug addicts—efforts to reduce the demand for drugs in the first place. Ultimate victory in the war on drugs cannot come until demand is vanquished.

But until demand can be reduced, our battle against the traffickers must continue. These weapons offer new promise that our undermanned, underarmed, and underfunded forces can fight this war and win—if we have the commitment to give our scientists and researchers the kind of support they need.

Mr. President, let me conclude by saying new weapons to fight drug traffickers are no substitute for comprehensive education in our schools or adequate treatment slots for drug addicts.

Efforts to reduce the demand for drugs, in the first place, will determine the ultimate victory of this war. These are extremely, extremely beneficial tools that can be used in the war.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill and a fact sheet on the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE COHEN-BIDEN CONTAC BILL

The Cohen-Biden Counter-Narcotics Technology Act of 1990 promotes the development of high-technologies that will help the United States secure its borders against narcotics and apprehend those involved in the drug trade.

While private companies typically spend 5–10 percent of their budgets on research and development, the U.S. government currently devotes less than two-thirds of 1% of its supply-side drug funding to R&D. Furthermore, the $46 million that the country did spend on anti-drug R&D last year amounted to only 1% of what is spent on "Star Wars" research. To accomplish its purpose, the Cohen-Biden bill calls for a significant increase in anti-drug technology research.

1. COORDINATION

The bill establishes the Counter-Narcotics Technology Assessment Center (CONTAC), a coordinating body for all high-technology anti-drug initiatives, within the Drug Director's Office. CONTAC will have its own Director (called the "Chief Scientist"), appointed on the basis of scientific, engineering, and technological expertise.

2. FUNDING

The bill consolidates the currently separate counter-drug research and development budgets of the various federal agencies into one budget line-item. Beginning in FY92, Congress will appropriate funds for this specific purpose and CONTAC will allocate the money to every agency doing research. The bill provides an immediate authorization of $150 million for anti-drug research and development—three times the present spending level.

3. AREAS OF RESEARCH

Proposed areas of research to be directed by CONTAC—and examples of burgeoning technology from each—include the following:

Surveillance and tracking—The Los Alamos National Laboratory has combined laser and radar technology into a device that can detect remote drug labs and processing sites. The device shoots a laser at targets and reads the patterns of light they reflect to identify the presence of illicit substances. (Every chemical compound reflects light in a unique way.)

Electronic support measures—The Customs Service is experimenting with a handheld instrument that can detect the presence of illicit and dangerous substances in large cargo containers, without removing their contents. The device measures the density of objects, and researchers can program it to warn Service agents when a shipment contains explosives, drugs, or guns.

Communications—The FBI is experimenting with a secure video communications system that will enable agents to film and relay action from the field to other agents around the country. The relays will be coded to prevent unauthorized viewing of them.

Advanced computer systems—The Los Alamos National Laboratory is developing a super-computer with artificial intelligence capabilities that can collect data on and analyze suspect money flows in American and foreign financial systems. The supercomputer will actually teach itself to uncover money laundering operations.

4. AUTHORITY

CONTAC's Director will identify the short, medium, and long-term scientific and technological needs of this country's drug enforcement agencies. Moreover, the Director will have the budget authority to fund CONTAC's pripority initiatives directly from the anti-drug R&D line-item appropriation.

CONCLUSION

Much of the technology that CONTAC will support has already been developed for military uses. The United States has invested heavily in the R&D, which now offers a good value for the country's drug-fighting dollar. CONTAC will simply have to readapt the technology to anti-drug efforts.

At the Senate Judiciary Committee's March 20 hearing on these high-technology anti-drug weapons, Senator Biden said: "The weapons we will hear about today potentially offer new help for [our] undermanned, underarmed, and underfunded forces who are attempting to fight this [drug] war." Senator Cohen similarly remarked that "there is tremendous promise in these technologies."

By Mr. LEVIN (for himself, Mr. SPECTER, Mr. BYRD, and Mr. RIEGLE):

S. 2569. A bill to amend the Trade Act of 1974 to strengthen and expand the authority of the U.S. Trade Representative to identify trade liberalization priorities, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

FAIR TRADE AND EXPORT EXPANSION ACT

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I am introducing today along with Senators SPECTER, BYRD, and RIEGEL, the Fair Trade and Export Promotion Act of 1990.

Last Friday, the Bush administration took Japan off the Super 301 list of priority unfair traders. The administration said, in effect, that despite a record of unfair trading practices by Japan that continues year after year, it will ignore the law that authorizes it to take strong action to end those unfair trading practices.

The Bush administration opted to ignore the record and to stick to the rhetoric which we have heard from Republican and Democratic administrations alike for two decades. Instead of standing up for American workers and American industry, this administration tells them that they must face the battle for this Nation's economic future alone.

What about Super 301, a law that we passed to force action on behalf of our economic survival? Mr. President, Super 301 has become nothing more than "Superficial 301."

The bill that we are introducing today will extend Super 301 and make sure the law lives up to its original name. It will put some teeth back into the law, put some fairness in our trade policy, and provide some relief to the American families losing jobs and our communities losing industries to unfair trade practices.

The bill will replace the administration's rhetoric with action. It will ensure that unfair traders are identified as such under our laws.

Two weeks ago, the administration testified before the Small Business Subcommittee on Innovation, which I chair, that our trade deficit with Japan is "top priority." Those words were theirs. And that our $10.5 billion auto parts trade deficit was a "top priority." Those words were theirs.

On Wednesday of last week, the U.S. Trade Representative herself reiterated that statement before the Finance Committee. She testified that Japan was one of a number of "top priorities." Those words were hers.

Yet, 2 days later, when the deadline arrived under Super 301 for the Trade Representative to identify "trade liberalization priorities," including "priority countries" and "priority practices," Japan was left off the list.

The administration's action in only naming India under Super 301 makes a mockery of both its strong words and, more important, makes a mockery of our law. Rather than using the Super 301 forum to negotiate the elimination of foreign trade barriers, the Bush administration has chosen to return to the old method of toothless negotiating, which has never worked. In contrast, Super 301 has proven to be effective when it has been used. In the three areas with Japan identified in 1989 as Super 301 priorities, agreements have been made for the elimination of barriers by a date certain.

Taking Japan off the list sends absolutely the wrong message. We should be saying to our trade partners who discriminate against our products, "Friends, the free ride is over. It is nothing personal. We admire you as people. But you must either end the discrimination against our auto parts, our steel, our computers, our beans, our fruits, et cetera, et cetera, et cetera, by a specific date or we must place comparable restrictions on your goods."

The administration had an opportunity to do this last week, but it chose not to do it.

The Trade Representative has said that the old method of negotiating works are making progress in negotiations with Japan. We have heard that before. For over 20 years we have negotiated this way with Japan. What we received from it is a $49 billion bilateral trade deficit, and almost 20 pages of Japanese trade barriers in the Trade Representatives' Reports on Foreign Trade Barriers.

Mr. President, for over 20 years, Democratic and Republican administrations have made claims of progress. One administration after another has told the American people what we heard from the Bush administration last Friday. Just listen to this.

President Nixon in 1970 said:

> In November, I met with Prime Minister Sato. He stated Japan's intention to accelerate the reduction and removal of its restrictions on trade and capital.

That was 1970, the promise to remove restrictions on trade came from Japan.

President Carter in October of 1980 said:

> I have stated quite clearly that the United States does not intend to abandon any portion of our share of the domestic auto market.

President Reagan in May 1984 said:

> During the past two years, Japan has made considerable progress in opening its markets further to American products, and we are confident that we'll see more progress in the months ahead.

That was 1984.

In 1987, President Reagan said that "our country has turned the corner on our trade deficit and the situation continues to improve."

Just last week echoed the same words, the same rhetoric, this time from President Bush, saying that our negotiations with Japan and the commitments that we have received from Japan represent a "promising start"; a promising start, in April of 1990, 20 years after President Nixon said that Japan has now promised to accelerate the removal of its restrictions on trade.

Mr. President, the bill that we introduce today moves us from rhetoric to action. It will require Super 301 action against the worst offenders, those countries who discriminate against American products and have a bilateral trade deficit which is 15 percent or more of the total U.S. trade deficit. And it will require Super 301 action on those unfair trade practices associated with a sectoral deficit equal to or exceeding 5 percent of the bilateral trade deficit.

Other countries and practices could also be cited by the Trade Representative but the worst offenders, and the worst practices, the ones that meet those criteria that I have indicated, would have to be cited as trade priorities.

The bill also provides an expedited procedure. Within 15 days after the Trade Representative identifies Super 301 priorities, a Member of Congress could initiate an expedited procedure to list additional trade liberalization priorities. Under this procedure, Congress, by a vote of three-fifths of the Congress, could require Super 301 action on unfair practices which did not qualify for mandatory Super 301 treatment, but merit citing. These unfair practices would merit citing because their elimination has a significant potential to increase U.S. exports, either directly or through the establishment of a beneficial precedent.

If subsequent negotiations were to fail to eliminate those discriminatory barriers against our product, our bill would require equivalent restrictions on other countries' products coming in here, equivalent that is to the restrictions that they place on our exports to them.

A waiver would still be available to the President under certain circumstances.

Our bill will send a strong message to our trading partners, the ones that discriminate against American goods and services. It will put an end to the pleading, an end to the rhetoric, an end to the empty promises, and make clear that if they persist in discriminating against our products that we will place equal restrictions on their products.

Mr. President, it is not anger that leads us to introduce this bill; it is economic necessity, and basic fairness for all Americans.

I urge my constituents not to be angry with Japan or other countries that discriminate against us but to aim their fire here, aim their anger here at us in Washington. We have control over our own economic destiny, and we can exercise it. I tell my constituents: do not be angry at other countries for defending their industry, their jobs, their agriculture; be angry at us.

I tell my constituents not to be angry at other countries that protect and defend their interests, but to aim their fire at us here in Washington for not going to bat with the same fire and the same passion for our constituents' jobs and our industries that other countries do for their jobs, for their agriculture, and for their industries.

Mr. President, I thank Senator SPECTER, Senator BYRD, and Senator RIEGLE, for cosponsoring this bill.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be included in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"(A) the amount of the trade deficit between the United States and such country for the calendar year for which a report under section 181 is submitted exceeds 15 percent of the amount of the total trade deficit of the United States for such calendar year,

"(B) the practices of such country have been identified under subsection (a)(1)(A) or under section 181(a)(1), and

"(C) such country has not entered into a free trade agreement with the United States.

"(2) MANDATORY IDENTIFICATION OF PRIORITY PRACTICE.—For purposes of this section, a practice shall be identified as a priority practice, and the Trade Representative shall initiate an investigation under section 302(b)(1) with respect to such practice if—

"(A) such practice is identified under section 181(a)(1), and

"(B) such practice is associated with a sectoral deficit (as listed in the National Trade Estimates) of 5 percent or more of the balance of trade between the United States and the foreign country conducting such practice for the calendar year for which a report under section 181 is submitted.

"(f) MANDATORY IDENTIFICATION BY JOINT RESOLUTION OF CONGRESS.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—Notwithstanding any other provision of law, a practice shall be identified as a priority practice and a foreign country shall be identified as a priority foreign country under this section, and the Trade Representative shall initiate an investigation under section 302(b)(1) with respect to such practice or country if a joint resolution described in paragraph (2) is enacted into law.

"(2) JOINT RESOLUTION DESCRIBED.—A resolution is described in this paragraph if it is a joint resolution—

"(A) which is introduced in either the Senate or the House of Representatives not later than 15 days after the date the Trade Representative identifies United States trade liberalization priorities under subsection (a)(1),

"(B) which is approved by three-fifths of the duly elected and sworn Members of each of the two Houses of Congress, and

"(C) the matter after the resolving clause of which contains the name of the country identified as a priority country or the practices identified as priority practices, and a finding that elimination of such priority practices is likely to have significant potential to increase United States exports, either directly or through establishment of a beneficial precedent.

"(3) HOUSE PROCEDURES.—(A) The provisions of this paragraph apply to the consideration in the House of Representatives of a joint resolution described in paragraph (2).

"(B) The joint resolution shall, upon introduction, be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives.

"(C) If the Committee on Ways and Means has not reported the joint resolution by the end of 30 legislative days after such joint resolution was introduced, the Committee shall be discharged from further consideration of the joint resolution and the joint resolution shall be placed on the appropriate calendar of the House.

The motion is highly privileged and is in order even though a previous motion to the same effect has been disagreed to. All points of order against the joint resolution under clauses 2 and 6 of Rule XXI of the Rules of the House are waived. If the motion is agreed to, the joint resolution shall remain the unfinished business of the House until disposed of. A motion to reconsider the vote by which the motion is disagreed to shall not be in order.

"(ii) Debate on the joint resolution shall not exceed 10 hours, which shall be divided equally between a Member favoring and a Member opposing the joint resolution. A motion to limit debate is in order at any time in the House or in the Committee of the Whole and is not debatable.

"(iii) An amendment to the joint resolution is not in order.

"(iv) At the conclusion of the debate on the joint resolution, the Committee of the Whole shall rise and report the joint resolution back to the House, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the joint resolution to final passage without intervening motion.

"(E) As used in this paragraph, the term 'legislative day' means a day on which the House is in session.

"(4) SENATE PROCEDURES.—(A) The provisions of this paragraph apply to the consideration in the Senate of a joint resolution described in paragraph (2).

"(B) A joint resolution shall, upon introduction, be referred to the Committee on Finance of the Senate.

"(C) If the Committee on Finance has not reported such joint resolution at the end of 30 legislative days after its introduction, the Committee shall be discharged from further consideration of such joint resolution and such joint resolution shall be placed on the calendar.

"(D)(i) Notwithstanding any rule or precedent of the Senate, including Rule 22, when the Committee to which a joint resolution is referred has reported, or has been discharged under subparagraph (C) from further consideration of a joint resolution, it is at any time thereafter in order (even though a previous motion to the same effect has been disagreed to) for any Member (after consultation with the majority leader as to the most appropriate time for the consideration of that joint resolution) to move to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution, and all points of order against the joint resolution (and against consideration of the joint resolution) are waived. The motion is privileged in the Senate and is not debatable. The motion is not subject to amendment, or to a motion to postpone, or to a motion to proceed to the consideration of other business. A motion to reconsider the vote by which the motion is agreed to or disagreed to shall not be in order. If a motion to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution is agreed to, the joint resolution shall remain the unfinished business of the Senate until disposed of.

"(ii) Debate on the joint resolution, and on all debatable motions and appeals in connection therewith, shall be limited to not more than 10 hours, which shall be divided equally between those favoring and those opposing the joint resolution. A motion further to limit debate is in order and not debatable. An amendment to, or a motion to postpone, or a motion to proceed to the consideration of other business, or a motion to recommit the joint resolution is not in order. A motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution is agreed to or disagreed to is not in order.

"(A) The joint resolution of the other House shall not be referred to a committee.

"(B) With respect to a joint resolution described in paragraph (2) of the House receiving the resolution—

"(i) the procedures in that House shall be the same as if no joint resolution had been received from the other House; but

"(ii) the vote on final passage shall be on the joint resolution of the other House.

"(C) Upon disposition of the joint resolution received from the other House, it shall no longer be in order to consider the joint resolution originated in the receiving House.

"(6) RULEMAKING POWER.—This section is enacted by Congress—

"(A) as an exercise of the rulemaking power of the House of Representatives and the Senate, respectively, and as such it is deemed a part of the rules of each House, respectively, but applicable only with respect to the procedure to be followed in that House in the case of a joint resolution described in paragraph (2), and it supersedes other rules only to the extent that it is inconsistent with such rules; and

"(B) with full recognition of the constitutional right of either House to change the rules (so far as relating to the procedure of that House) at any time, in the same manner, and to the same extent as in the case of any other rule of that House.".

SEC. 4. MANDATORY ACTION.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Section 301(a)(1) of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. 2411(a)(1)) is amended—

(1) by striking "or" at the end of subparagraph (A),

"(C)(i) a priority practice identified under section 310, or

"(ii) a priority practice with respect to a priority foreign country identified under section 310, Constitutes an act, policy, or practice of a foreign country is unreasonable or discriminatory and burdens or restricts United States commerce;".

(b) CONFORMING AMENDMENT.—Section 304(a)(1)(A)(ii) is amended by striking "(a)(1)(B)" and inserting "(a)(1)(B), (a)(1)(C),".

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, today, I join Senator LEVIN in introducing a bill to strengthen the Super 301 provision of the Omnibus Trade and Competitiveness Act of 1988. This bill is in response to the Bush administration's announcement of Friday, April 27, 1990, to remove Japan from the list of priority countries which practice unfair trade policies against the United States.

I am concerned about the effect of Japan's unfair trade practices on United States industries. Japan for the second year in a row led the list of countries maintaining significant barriers to imports of United States products, according to the Office of the United States Trade Representative's [USTR] "1990 National Trade Estimate Report of Foreign Trade Barriers." This report, which is mandated by Congress under the Trade Act of 1974, devotes 19 pages, more than for any other country, to Japan's many trade barriers. These barriers affect U.S. industries ranging from footwear to agriculture to aluminum. Despite these many barriers, Japan was not cited this year as a priority country. This report on foreign trade barriers is used as a basis for the USTR to determine which countries and which practices in those countries pose the most significant barriers to trade, under the Super 301 provision. Super 301 requires the USTR to designate priority foreign trade barriers whose removal would most likely increase U.S. exports.

In addition, I am concerned about Japan's history of breaking its trade agreements with the United States. In 1986, Japan entered into the United States-Japan Semiconductor Agreement, promising to increase foreign producers' share of the Japanese semiconductor market from the 8.5-percent level in 1986 to 20 percent by 1991. Currently, that share sits at a disappointing 13 percent.

Senator LEVIN and I and our colleagues know what is happening in our States. The fact is, we are suffering very badly from Japan's refusal to open its market while we continue to grant Japan free access to ours. The only way we can correct this situation is to ensure that the Super 301 is used effectively, and that is to mandate the USTR to cite those countries whose unfair trade barriers meet certain requirements, and to require the USTR to retaliate if negotiations do not succeed in eliminating these unfair practices.

I believe that the little relief we have had so far has come as a result of the pressure Congress has put on Japan to open its markets. However, we cannot stop here. We need to push Japan and other unfair traders to open their markets further so that we have both free and fair trade. The bill Senator LEVIN and I are introducing today will go a long way in ensuring that this goal is fulfilled.

By Ms. MIKULSKI (for herself and Mr. SARBANES):

S. 2570. A bill to amend title 5, United States Code, to provide higher rates of basic pay for Federal employees within the consolidated metropolitan statistical areas of which the District of Columbia and the city of Baltimore, Maryland is a part; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

HIGHER PAY BASED ON LOCALITY

● Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. President, today, I am introducing legislation on behalf of Senator SARBANES and myself that would extend higher pay based on locality for Federal workers who work within the consolidated metropolitan statistical areas of which the District of Columbia and the city of Baltimore, MD, are a part.

President Bush's budget proposal for fiscal year 1991 proposes an increase in pay for Federal employees for three specific localities: Los Angeles, San Francisco, and New York City. The metropolitan statistical areas of Washington, DC, and Baltimore, MD, are not included in the administration proposal.

If Federal pay is going to be adjusted on the basis of local cost of living, the Federal employees of the Washington and Baltimore area must be represented. This area is recognized as one of the highest cost of living areas in the United States, but the administration has failed to recognize this fact and also the fact that pay for the Federal workers of this area has not kept pace with the private sector.

We must be prepared to pay a fair and reasonable wage if we are to maintain a Federal work force that ably performs the day-to-day functions of Government. This bill will begin that first step in 1991. It will begin to raise Federal pay to a level that is on a par with private sector pay.

The bill I am sponsoring would designate a higher rate of basic pay for Federal employees within the consolidated metropolitan statistical areas of which the District of Columbia and the city of Baltimore, MD, are a part. The rate of basic pay for an employee would be equal to 108 percent of the rate of basic pay which would apply for that employee. The bill would take effect for pay periods beginning on or after January 1, 1991.

I recognize and appreciate the important work that is being done by my colleagues in the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee in the area of Federal pay reform. This bill is intended to contribute to the dialog on pay reform and I offer this bill in the hope that it will be considered along with the other proposals made in this area.

In this time of continued disparity between Federal pay and private sector pay, the Congress should be taking the steps necessary to improve our Government's productivity and efficiency. Pay increases for Federal workers are an important first step. The legislation I am introducing today makes a limited, but serious attempt to meet that goal.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2570

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) subchapter VII of chapter 53 of title 5, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following:

"§ 5376. Higher pay based on locality

"(a) For the purpose of this section—

"(1) the term 'statutory pay system' has the meaning given such term by section 5301(c) (and includes the pay system under chapter 54); and

"(2) the term 'consolidated metropolitan statistical area' means a consolidated metropolitan statistical area, as established by the Office of Management and Budget as of the date of enactment of this section.

"(b) Effective for pay periods beginning on or after January 1, 1991—

"(1) the rate of basic pay for any employee under a statutory pay system who is employed within a consolidated metropolitan statistical area which includes the District of Columbia (or any portion thereof) or a

"(2) the maximum rate of basic pay payable to any employee under this section shall be equal to 108 percent of the maximum rate allowable under section 5308.

"(c) For purposes of applying subchapter VI to an employee who changes from a position which is subject to this section to a position which is not, a rate of basic pay payable to such employee, as of any time before the change, shall be determined as if this section had never been enacted.

"(d) The Office of Personnel Management shall prescribe regulations necessary for the administration of this section, including regulations for determining where an individual is employed.

"(e) For purposes of section 5303, rates for pay establishd under this section may be taken into account to such extent as the President (or the Office of Personnel Management or other agency, as applicable) considers appropriate.

"(f) Any rate of pay in effect under this section on the date as of which this section ceases to be effective shall remain in effect until adjusted by or in accordance with law.".

(b) CLERICAL AMENDMENT.—The table of sections for chapter 53 of title 5, United States Code, is amended by adding after the item relating to section 5375 the following:

"5376. Higher pay based on locality."●

By Mr. GORE:

S. 2571. A bill to amend the Antarctic Conservation Act of 1978 to protect the environment of Antarctic, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Enviornment and Public Works.

ANTARCTIC ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION ACT OF 1990

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I rise today to discuss Antarctica, an issue not frequently debated on the floor of the U.S. Senate, and that is the issue of Antarctica. It is an issue that I brought to the Senate last September, when I introduced a resolution calling on the United States to encourage immediate negotiations toward a new agreement among Antarctic Treaty Consultive Parties for the full protection of Antarctica as a global ecological reserve and land of commons. Twenty-four of my colleagues have joined as co-sponsors of that resolution, sending a clear signal to the administration that the Senate, and the American public, are ready to take the steps necessary to protect the extremely fragile and extremely important environment of Antarctica.

More importantly, Mr. President, this question represents a major opportunity to put into effect a new emerging global consensus on the necessity of imaginative, bold measures to protect the world's ecological system.

We have just concluded an international parliamentary conference on the global environment, the results of which I will report to the Senate on a later occasion.

But one of the recommendations of the delegates from 42 nations who met here in Washington for 3½ days, concluding yesterday with the signing of a declaration of environmental interdependence, was that Antarctica be protected from any minerals and mining exploration and exploitation. It is an absolutely unique environmental resource 90 percent of all the ice in the world is in Antarctica. It is a massive source of cold in the Earth's climate system.

Next to the sun and the rotation of the Earth, the Antarctic continent is the most powerful single engine driving the world's climate system, a rich storehouse of historical climate data, and it is the place where the most serious global environmental problems—global warming and destruction of the stratospheric ozone layer—are likely to occur first and most dramatically.

Indeed, as is well known, when the hole in the ozone layer appeared above Antarctica, scientists from nations around the world conducted emergency expeditions there to find out why and to find out more about why global warming is taking place because the early warning signs are there in Antarctica as well.

It remains the most pristine continent on Earth, a place that has so far withstood for the most part the impact of this global ecological crisis.

The ice and snow of Antarctica contain 70 percent of all the fresh water on Earth, and yet the continent receives so little precipitation, it is classified as the world's largest desert. It is dark for 6 months in winter yet still receives more sunlight during its 6 months of summer than the equatorial regions receive during an entire year—light for the most part that is reflected straight back up into space because of the reflectivity of the surface made up of ice and snow.

The cold water surrounding the continent of Antarctica absorbs more carbon dioxide from the atmosphere than all the rain forests of the Earth and create the nutrient-rich bottom water for most of the world ocean of which Antarctica is the epicenter.

Last year the "Exon Valdez" disaster in Prince William Sound presented vivid, heartbreaking illustrations of the consequences of environmental disaster in a pristine wilderness. In January 1989, an Argentinian ship, the Bahia Paraiso, ran aground in waters off Antarctica. This incident did not attract the widespread public attention of the Valdez spill, partly because the area is so inaccessible to television cameras. It was not a drama played out on the evening news and it was smaller then the Prince William Sound catastrohpe.

But is was disastrous nonetheless, destroying years of research and leaving behind an indelible stain.

Incidentally, the site of the Bahia Paraiso accident was also the site of the only research program in the entire world to discover the effects of increased ultraviolet radiation on the ability of plankton in the ocean to absorb CO_2 out of the atmosphere. Three years' worth of baseline data were destroyed by the oil spill and now the world's science community has to start over from scratch on what could turn out to be one of the single most important scientific questions ever investigated by human kind, a vivid example of the dangers of allowing unrestrained exploitation of the Antarctic environment.

Last year, according to the National Science Foundation, there was a leak of more than 50,000 gallons of fuel at the American base at McMurdo Sound. The waters immediately adjacent to the base are among the most polluted in the world. PCB's and other chemicals, dumped years ago, have killed every vestige of life in albeit a small area of McMurdo Sound. But it is, generally, a vivid reminder of why we need to do better.

The bill that I am introducing today in conjunction with other legislation to be introduced today by my colleague, Senator KERRY, is called the Antarctic Environmental Protection Act of 1990. It was introduced in the House of Representatives by my friend Congressman WALTER JONES, the distinguished chairman of the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. President, I feel that this bill, which amends the Antarctic Conservation Act of 1978, will help to protect Antarctica's environment in ways that existing U.S. laws and institutions have not adequately provided. This bill will provide the additional environmental protection that is needed.

The bill calls for the preparation and annual update of a waste management plan for Antarctica. The plan must include, among other items, a schedule for cleaning up existing U.S. waste disposal sites and abandoned work sites.

The bill also calls for regulations prescribing waste management practices for U.S. activities in Antarctica. One practice requires that all open burning of wastes be phased out and prohibited after December 31, 1991. Another practice requires that landfills at coastal U.S. facilities be phased out and prohibited after December 31, 1991.

The bill requires implementation of a long-term program for the removal of wastes from Antarctica that occurred as a result of U.S. activities. Radioactive materials, batteries, abandoned fuel drums, chemical wastes, and wastes containing high levels of metals must be collected and removed from Antarctica for proper disposal in accordance with applicable U.S. environmental laws. All plastic wastes have to be removed from Antarctica unless they are incinerated in equipment that neutralizes all harmful air emissions.

The Coast Guard is directed to issue regulations requiring all vessels engaged in or supporting U.S. activities in Antarctica to incorporate compacting, storage, and incineration facilities to properly dispose of waste. Incinerators must also reduce all harmful emissions.

The bill addresses the issue of marine pollution in Antarctica, by making it unlawful to discharge oil or plastic into the marine environment. Food wastes, other garbage, and sewage are prohibited from being discharged within 12 nautical miles of the closest land or ice shelf. There is also language pertaining to marine pollution prevention and liability.

The Coast Guard is called on to issue regulations requiring vessels engaged in or supporting U.S. Antarctic activities, including tourist expeditions, to have contingency plans and equipment to prevent and respond to oilspills. The owner, operator, or individual in charge of a vessel engaged in or supporting U.S. Antarctica activities will be held liable for the removal of oil spilled in Antarctica and the restoration of damages to natural resources. In the event that restoration is not feasible, the person will be liable for the payment of a civil penalty, and any moneys recovered from the assessment of the civil penalty will be used by the United States to manage specially protected areas or sites of special scientific interest.

The bill also provides for monitoring Antarctica's environment, by calling for the implementation of a long-term environmental monitoring program for Antarctica. The program is to include the detection and monitoring of global environmental change, and also should monitor the impacts of waste disposal, scientific bases, and scientific programs on the Antarctic environment.

The bill calls for the creation of new specially protected areas in Antarctica. There are two new types of specially protected areas: one for sites of outstanding scientific or ecological interest and one for outstanding scenic, wilderness, or geographic value. In addition, multiple-use planning areas may be designated.

Finally, the bill makes the National Environmental Policy Act of 1969 applicable to the activities of all agencies of the Federal Government operating in Antarctica, including NSF and the State Department. The bill also requires the Secretary of State, in consultation with other interested agencies, to prepare an environmental impact statement on the Convention on the Regulation of Antarctic Mineral Activities before submitting the Convention to the Senate for its advice and consent.

Now, I want to allay any concern that this bill might force the NSF to divert funds away from science, and toward efforts to comply with the environmental protection measures called for in this bill. It is my strong view that Antarctica should always be open and freely accessible to science. I will always champion that cause, and I will always work within the Congress to fully support the research of U.S. scientists in Antarctica.

At the same time, I know from my own visit to Antarctica and from discussions with scientists on many occasions, that scientists want to protect the environment of Antarctica. After all, it is the scientists who in the first place have alerted us to the fragility and magnificence of Antarctica. But they need the means to protect Antarctica, and that is why this bill is important, because the bill calls for the appropriation of funds to provide those means.

Mr. President, we can measure the future of the Earth in the frozen breezes of Antarctica. As we confront the global ecological crisis, it's time to change our understanding of what is possible. We can't afford to settle for less.

Antarctica is not only a valuable wilderness. It is also a point to which our global perspective ought to be pulled, because it is from Antarctica that the future of the Earth can be seen. In the words of the World Commission on Environment and Development—the Brundtland Commission—the challenge is to ensure that Antarctica is managed in the interests of all humankind, in a manner that conserves its unique environment, preserves its value for scientific research, and retains its character as a demilitarized, non-nuclear zone of peace.

By Mr. THURMOND (for himself and Mr. BIDEN):

S. 2572. A bill to provide for the extension of certain authority for the Marshal of the Supreme Court and the Supreme Court Police; placed on the calendar.

EXTENDED POLICE PROTECTION TO THE SUPREME COURT

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, today, I am pleased to join with my distinguished colleague from Delaware, Senator BIDEN, in introducing legislation which will ensure the continued availability of police protection to the U.S. Supreme Court Justices while they are off of the Supreme Court grounds.

Under current law, the Supreme Court Police may provide protection outside of the Court grounds to the Supreme Court Justices, and to any officer, employee, or official guest of the Supreme Court. Unfortunately, this authority expires at the end of this year. This legislation would replace the statute's sunset provision with a permanent authorization for protection which is clearly appropriate.

Mr. President, this provision of law is rarely, if ever, used. Yet, it is vitally necessary. Should events arise which would require the police protection of the Chief Justice or an Associate Justice, protection must be available. In this time of escalating crime, drug trafficking, and narcoterrorism, it is essential that the U.S. Supreme Court Justices and their employees have police protection if, and when, the unfortunate need should arise.

In closing, this legislation was requested by Chief Justice Rehnquist. He has expressed concern that this protection should be available if the need for such protection should ever arise. I believe that it is extremely important that we take this step to enhance the safety of our Nation's highest court.

For these reasons, I urge my colleagues to support this legislation.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I rise today to join Senator THURMOND in introducing legislation to provide for the extension of authority for the Marshal of the Supreme Court and the Supreme Court Police.

Under current law, the Supreme Court Police have the authority to protect the Justices, Court personnel and official visitors in "any part of the United States."

This authority to provide security for Supreme Court Justices beyond the building and grounds of the Court has existed since 1982, but will expire, through a sunset provision, on December 31, 1990. The legislation introduced today by Senator THURMOND and myself eliminates this sunset provision and makes permanent this important security authority.

The existing authority of Supreme Court Police to accompany the Justices, their guests, and Supreme Court employees on trips beyond the Court grounds is necessary in order to ensure the safety of these individuals. While trips of this nature are infrequent, and usually of relatively short distance, it is important that we provide for the security of Supreme Court personnel in all phases of their service. The recent, tragic events involving a Federal judge serve as an unfortunate reminder of the need for adequate safeguards.

I believe that the authority of Supreme Court Police to provide protection beyond the grounds of the Court is justified and should be made permanent. I encourage my colleagues to support this legislation.

I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the bill be reprinted in the RECORD following these remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2572

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 9(c) of the Act entitled "An Act relating to the policing of the building and grounds of the Supreme Court of the United States", approved August 18, 1949 (40 U.S.C. 13n(c)), is amended by striking the first two sentences.

By Mr. RIEGLE (for himself, Mr. HEINZ, and Mr. LEVIN):

S. 2573. A bill to promote fair trade in auto parts, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

FAIR TRADE IN AUTO PARTS ACT

● Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, last week, the administration made a serious mistake when it failed to identify trade in auto parts and accessories with Japan as a trade liberalization priority under the Super 301 provision of the 1988 Trade Act. Indeed, by failing to name any new trade liberalization priorities, the administration strayed in no uncertain terms from the intent of Congress. The conference report to the Omnibus Trade and Competitiveness Act of 1988 clearly stated that the changes made to Super 301 in conference were "not intended to result in the identification of only token practices and countries."

The administration's decision sends the wrong signal to Japan at a key moment for both the auto parts and semiconductor industries. Ambassador Hills justified her decision on auto parts in part by arguing that negotiations are in process on this topic in the structural impediments initiative talks. Mr. President, auto parts negotiations with Japan have been in progress in one form or another since 1986. After nearly 4 years, American companies continue to wait for significant results. Without further action by their Government, I am afraid their wait will be in vain.

The structural impediments initiative, however well intentioned, is at root little more than another in a long series of promises of future progress by the Japanese Government. The structural impediments initiative talks provide no mechanism to measure whether general promises translate into changes in behavior and increases in American sales. The auto parts industry has already lived through 4 years of promises. It is unacceptable to ask it, as the administration in effect has, to live through another 4 years of empty promises.

The industry does not have 4 more years to wait; it is already on the threshold of a serious crisis. Production by foreign auto companies in North America rose from zero in 1980 to over a million cars in 1988. It is expected to double again—to approximately 2.5 million cars—by the end of this year. At the same time, GM, Ford, and Chrysler have been slashing productive capacity. As a result, in the space of less than a decade, foreign auto manufacturers have taken over more than one-fourth of all auto production in North America.

This change in the auto industry in the 1980's has powerful implications for the parts industry in the 1990's. A 1989 study by the General Accounting Office for Chairman BENTSEN found that Japanese car companies in the United States rely on their family of affiliated suppliers for over 60 percent of their components. By contrast, the Big Three source nearly 90 percent of their components from traditional American companies. Since the transplant assembly operations coming on line are by and large replacing Big Three production, the traditional auto parts industry stands to lose as much as in the next 2 or 3 years as the Big Three have lost in the past five.

It would be one thing if American firms were destined to lose this business on competitive grounds. But there is evidence that the same unfair trade practices that have blocked United States exports to the Japanese market are now blocking United States sales to foreign subsidiaries in our own market. In addition, there is significant evidence that Japanese parts firms are underpricing traditional American firms in the United States market, despite an adverse foreign exchange rate, because they earn higher profits from a captive home market that is maintained by blocking foreign access. This is an all too familiar pattern of Japanese industrial success. Finally, for cyclical reasons, auto sales are expected to be weak in the near term, and a recession would complicate matters even further.

Accordingly, as the foreign share of auto assembly in North America grows, the threat to traditional American upstream industries, like the parts industry, will grow unless steps are taken to ensure that: First, the transplants make procurement decisions in the United States on the basis of the same competitive principles as the Big Three; and second, Japanese parts companies lose the artificial advantage of a closed home market.

Mr. President, we cannot allow the anticompetitive practices that are common in Japan to take root in American soil. The best time to influence this matter is now, as the transplant assembly operations are coming online and still forming their supply relationships. We must exert the necessary pressure before the die is cast. The stakes are too high—in terms of jobs and our technological and industrial base—to take a wait-and-see attitude for another few years.

For this reason, I am pleased to introduce with bipartisan and industry support a bill sending the clear message that the U.S. Government will not be content merely to conclude another round of negotiations. It expects early, meaningful results and will take concrete steps to measure such results, or the lack thereof, in the marketplace.

The bill requires semiannual reports containing data detailing the extent of increases in auto parts sales by traditonal United States firms to Japanese assemblers in both the United States and Japanese markets. The lack of data in this form has hindered the market oriented sector specific negotiations process since its inception in 1986. Without it, progress cannot be measured accurately. And without meaningful public accountability, Japanese companies are under less pressure to mend their ways.

The bill creates Department of Commerce and International Trade Commission reports to produce data on traditional United States company exports to the Japanese market and sales to foreign transplants in the North American market, respectively. The Commerce Department report is not a new report; it is a refinement of the existing reporting requirement of the auto parts provision of the 1988 Trade Act, the so-called Quayle amendment.

In addition to these two reports, the bill requests a study from the Department of Justice to determine whether there is sufficient validity to reports of anticompetitive practices by transplants in the U.S. market to warrant a more formal antitrust investigation.

Finally, the bill calls for a section 301 investigation with respect to auto parts trade with Japan.

Again, Mr. President, the administration made a serious mistake last week in failing to maintain strong pressure on Japan in the critically important area of auto parts trade. Congress should respond by taking these actions in view of the long track record of minimal progress on United States-Japan auto parts trade, the large share of our bilateral trade deficit attributable to auto parts—over one-fifth—the lack of available means in the structural impediments initiative to measure results, and the fact that the industry is at a critical juncture due to the continuing replacement of Big Three plants by transplant operations and a possible recession.

Indeed, this is a pivotal moment both for the U.S. auto parts industry and for U.S. trade policy. Mr. President, this bill is no substitute for the need to extend and strengthen Super 301, which I will continue to work on with my colleagues. Rather, the bill is an effort to take more immediate, practical steps to prevent a crisis in an industry critical to the industrial base of the United States and the economic base of the State of Michigan.

All too often in this country, trade and industrial policy is reactive. We wait for a crisis to happen, and then cast about for ways to pick up the pieces. I urge my colleagues to try to avoid repeating the same mistake in the auto parts industry by cosponsoring this bill.●

By Mr. CHAFEE (for himself, Mr. DOMENICI, and Mr. DOLE):

S. 2574. A bill to amend the Social Security Act to improve old-age, survivors, and disability insurance benefits and supplemental security income benefits, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

SOCIAL SECURITY WORK INCENTIVES AND SSI BENEFITS IMPROVEMENT ACT

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I am pleased to be joined by Senators DOMENICI and DOLE in introducing the Social Security Work Incentives and SSI Benefits Improvements Act. Our legislation would liberalize the Social Security earnings limitation and increase supplemental security income benefits.

Among its major goals, the original Social Security Program provided incentives for older workers to retire, thus making room for younger workers in the labor force. Over the years, benefit expansions, the availability of early retirement, and other features of the program have encouraged older workers to retire at earlier and earlier ages.

Today, given the impending retirement of the baby-boom generation and the prospect of a shrinking labor force, we need the time, talents, and expertise of our older Americans in the work force. Senior citizens, however, are retiring earlier yet living longer.

In 1940, the average age when a person began receiving Social Security benefits was 68, and the average life span was about 63 years. Today, however, the average person begins to collect benefits at age 64, yet the average life span has risen to about 75 years.

Seniors who continue working past the normal retirement age not only contribute toward our continued economic growth, but benefit by keeping their bodies and minds active. People who are productive and fulfilled are often happier and healthier—I believe this is particularly true with regard to older Americans.

The Social Security Program was designed to provide seniors with a degree of financial security in their retirement. Unfortunately, about 3.5 million people over the age of 65 live in poverty, even though virtually all of them receive Social Security benefits.

Social Security was never intended to provide for all of a retiree's income, but rather to supplement a retiree's personal retirement savings and private pension. Yet, today with our increased medical technology, a retiree's private savings are at risk of being depleted due to a catastrophic illness or placement in a nursing home. Some beneficiaries may not have been fortunate enough during their working years to save for their retirement.

Thus, some Social Security recipients supplement their benefits out of necessity. Others work by choice—they may wish to remain active and productive. Unfortunately, two provisions of Social Security law currently discourage older Americans from continuing to work past the normal retirement age: the Social Security earnings test and delayed retirement credit [DRC].

Under the existing earnings limitation, retirees over age 65 have their benefits reduced by $1 for every $3 earned over $9,360. In addition, the current DRC does not treat equitably beneficiaries who choose to delay accepting Social Security benefits. Although the DRC was intended to provide beneficiaries with full credit for the amount that they would have received had they not delayed retirement, it does not provide adequate compensation.

Our legislation would allow seniors to make as much as the average American wage earner—about $23,000 once fully phased-in—without having their benefits reduced. In addition, our bill would accelerate the delayed retirement credit to ensure that people who choose to postpone collecting benefits are treated fairly.

Now, some of my distinguished colleagues would argue that we should repeal the earnings limitation entirely. Others would argue that people who work, even part time, are not retired—therefore a deduction in their Social Security benefits is fully justified. In my view, we cannot afford to subsidize the retirement of high income individuals through the Social Security earnings limitation, which is what full repeal would do. At the same time, we shold not discourage low- and middle-income seniors from supplementing their incomes, particularly if a part-time job is necessary for survival, which is what current law encourages.

Our bill reconciles these issues by raising the earnings limitation to the average wage earnings level. Thus, under our legislation, those individuals earning less than the average worker, are considered to be supplementing their retirement income. Individuals earning more than the average worker, however, have incomes too great to be considered retired; thus, any income above the average wage earnings level would be subject to the earnings limitation.

Based on previous CBO estimates, the liberalization of the earnings limitation in our bill would benefit over 600,000 recipients. Next year, about 85,000 people would no longer be subjected to the earnings limit penalty. Once fully phased-in, well over quarter of a million beneficiaries would have no benefit reduction at all. It is worth noting that a substantial percentage of women would benefit from our proposal. Many are widows, and currently receive monthly benefits at or slightly above the poverty level.

Our bill, however, would not only benefit those who are able and willing to work. We have included an increase in SSI benefits to help improve the lives of some of our most vulnerable and impoverished citizens—those who are aged, blind, or who have disabilities. A $3 benefit increase for an individual and a $5 benefit for a couple, including a cost-of-living adjustment, translates into an annual increase in income of $141 for an individual and $218 for a couple.

The Social Security Work Incentives and SSI Benefits Improvements Act would also provide Social Security retirement, survivors, disability, and Medicare protection for State and local Employees who have no financial or health care retirement security. These employees, many of whom work part time, are currently not covered by either the Social Security and Medicare programs or a State or local retirement program. Our intent is to provide retirement and disability income security for those State and local employees who a State or local government has failed to protect in a retirement plan. As a result of our inclusion of this provision, our bill does something few bills pending in the Senate do—that is to bring in more revenue than is needed to fully cover the cost of an increase in the Social Security earnings test and acceleration of the DRC.

The Republican leader, Senator ARMSTRONG and other Republicans over the past few years have been fervently working to increase the Social Security earnings limitation. Although the Finance Committee approved a substantial increase in the earnings limit and the Senate overwhelming approved three other amendments last year, which I cosponsored, to increase the earnings test, a liberalization of the earnings test was never enacted.

It is my sincere hope that this year we will raise the earnings limitation and in so doing, recognize the important contributions of our seniors, and encourage older Americans to stay active and continue working.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a summary of the bill, the bill itself, and a letter of support from the American Association of Retired Persons be included in the RECORD as if read.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"(II) include in such notification a description of the procedures to be followed, in the case of a joint return, to protect the share of the refund which may be payable to another person.

"(ii) ADJUSTMENTS BASED ON PROTECTIONS GIVEN TO OTHER TAXPAYERS ON JOINT RETURN.—If the other person filing a joint return with the person owing the OASDI overpayment takes appropriate action to secure his or her proper share of the refund subject to reduction under this subsection, the Secretary shall pay such share to such other person. The Secretary shall deduct the amount of such payment from amounts which are derived from subsequent reductions in refunds under this subsection and are payable to a trust fund referred to in subparagraph (C).

"(C) DEPOSIT OF AMOUNT OF REDUCTION INTO APPROPRIATE TRUST FUND.—In lieu of payment, pursuant to paragraph (1)(B), of the amount of any reduction under this subsection to the Secretary of Health and Human Services, the Secretary shall deposit such amount in the Federal Old-Age and Survivors Insurance Trust Fund or the Federal Disability Insurance Trust Fund, whichever is certified to the Secretary as appropriate by the Secretary of Health and Human Services.

DESCRIPTION OF CHAFEE-DOMENICI BILL

1. Earnings test.—Increase by $2,000 above current law indexing for the next five years. That is more than $2,500 per year. The goal would be to double the exempt amount and eventually reach the average earnings level in economy. The exempt amounts would be:

	1990	1991	1992	1993	1994	1995
Current law	9,360	$9,960	$10,440	$11,040	$11,640	$12,240
Proposal		11,960	14,600	17,360	20,240	23,360

2. Delayed Retirement Credit (DRC).—The DRC is intended to compensate Social Security beneficiaries for benefits lost due to delayed retirement. Recent estimates indicate that an 8 percent benefit increase for each year retirement is delayed is fair, actuarily. The current DRC is 3 percent per year, and being increased gradually. This provision would increase the DRC more quickly so it reaches 8 percent by 1995, not in 2004 as under current law.

3. SSI Benefit Expansions.—The first proposals is a basic benefit increase of $3 per month for individuals and $5 per month for couples. A second expansion would count the lesser of the actual value of in-kind benefits or the current one-third reduction rule against a beneficiary's SSI benefits. (The "one-third" rule requires an individual living in another's household and receiving in-kind support from that household to have their SSI benefits reduced by one-third.)

4. Eliminate retroactive benefits.—This provision was included as an offset to Senator Armstrong's earnings test amendment to the minimum wage bill. This would eliminate an option that allows workers that retire "retroactively" to get extra money up front in exchange for lower future benefits. (Most retroactive benefits were repealed in 1977, but this specific provision was retained.)

5. Income Tax Refund Offset.—This would allow the IRS to withhold income tax refunds from former beneficiaries who consistently fail to repay their outstanding Social Security program overpayments. This proposal is included in the President's Budget.

6. Expand Social Security Coverage.—Effective January 1, 1990, mandatory social security coverage would be extended to those employees of state and local governments who do not currently participate in any state or local retirement system. Currently, about 3.3 million state and local government employees are not covered by OASDI and/or a public employee retirement plan. This makes the bill a deficit reducer, has good equity arguments in favor of it, and will provide added retirement coverage to some.

AMERICAN ASSOCIATION OF RETIRED PERSONS,
Washington, DC, May 3, 1990.

Hon. JOHN CHAFEE,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR CHAFEE: The American Association of Retired Persons (AARP) commends you for introducing the Social Security Work Incentives and Supplemental Security Income (SSI) Benefits Improvements Act. Your legislation provides needed assistance to two groups of older Americans: those who collect Social Security benefits and continue working after 65 and those receiving SSI benefits. Your legislation would improve the economic well-being of both these groups in a financially responsible manner.

AARP supports a liberalization of the earnings limit because the current limit of $9,360 for those 65 to 69 is much too restrictive. Moderate income beneficiaries who work out of necessity often must decide between limiting their earnings or losing some or all of their benefits. A $2,000 increase in the earnings limit would enable these beneficiaries to better deal with the rising costs of medical care and other essentials. At the same time, they would be contributing to our economy and maintaining their vigor and vitality.

AARP applauds the proposed acceleration of the Delayed Retirement Credit (DRC) phase-in to the actuarially correct level of eight percent. Since current law does not fully compensate an individual who continues working past 65 instead of collecting benefits, it discourages older workers from remaining in the work force on a full-time basis and penalizes those who make this choice. An eight percent DRC would promote greater work force participation by older persons because they will receive appropriate compensation for their decision to postpone receiving benefits.

Finally, increasing SSI benefits levels is equally important. Even though these increases are modest—$3 for an individual and $5 for a couple—it means that in 1991 (with a cost of living adjustment) the individual receiving an average SSI benefit will see an annual increase in income of $141. A couple receiving the average benefit would see an annual increase of $218. While these amounts are small, the extra income is extremely important to SSI recipients. In fact, these annual amounts are almost equal to the 1989 monthly benefit levels.

AARP believes that the Social Security Work Incentives and Supplemental Security Income Benefits Improvement Act is well-conceived and fiscally responsible. We look forward to working with you to ensure quick action on the bill.

Sincerely,

HORACE B. DEETS.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I am here today to do my part to rectify a strong work disincentive that confronts older Americans.

I talk of the Social Security earnings test. The earnings test is poor labor policy, and is becoming even worse labor policy as we enter the decade of 1990's, a decade in which this country could experience increasing labor shortages without changes in policy.

As a result, Senator CHAFEE, myself, and others are introducing legislation that will raise significantly the earnings exempt from the Social Security earnings test. We have carefully crafted the bill so it is achievable in the current deficit environment.

This year, the earnings test reduces Social Security benefits by $1 for every $3 earned above $9,360. This is in addition to income taxes and FICA taxes. As a result, a Social Security recipient earning as little as $10,000 can face an "effective marginal tax rate" in excess of 60 percent.

As labor shortages spread across the country, we certainly cannot afford this type of a work disincentive—one that affects in particular middle-income earners such as educators and nurses. Our country already faces labor shortages in these professions. We cannot discourage such work.

There are relatively few young workers entering the labor force, a trend expected to continue. And we have a ready pool of skilled and valued workers. Our Nation's seniors. Many want to work. Some don't though, because of the earnings test. With our society's demographics changing, we cannot afford to actively discourage older Americans from contributing through the work force. And that's exactly what the earnings test does.

From 1870 to 1930, about 65 percent of the men over age 65 worked, but that percent declined steadily to 32 percent in 1980. Fewer senior citizens work because it is easier to retire now. Income, savings, and wealth have increased. Social Security was created and private pensions became more generous. Many seniors don't need to work. But some do—and work disincentives, such as the earnings test, also have their effect.

A recent nationwide Gallup poll, commissioned by the Employee Benefit Research Institute, found that over half of those interviewed of working age planned to continue working after they began collecting Social Security. However, when told of the Social Security earnings test, 18 pecent of those planning to work said they would not do so because of the Social Security earnings test.

Right now, more than 600,000 beneficiaries are adversely affected by the earnings test. That is composed of the 600,000 recipients who directly have their Social Security checks reduced by the earnings test plus some unknown number of older Americans who choose not to work or hide earnings to avoid reductions in their Social Security checks.

Many want complete repeal of the earnings test. In some respects, I share their desire, but I have concerns about an outright repeal. The cost—over $5 billion per year—will take a big bite out of the Social Security reserves that are now building for the baby boomers' retirement. Gains from a complete repeal will go primarily to high-income senior citizens.

However, I strongly support a raise in the earnings test so it doesn't affect the middle-income working senior. I want to protect the Social Security reserves. The legislation we have drafted protects the reserves, will eventually double the earnings exempt from the earnings test, and reduces the unified budget deficit.

Let me spend just a moment highlighting those features I feel most strongly about:

Earnings test.—Our bill would increase the exempt amount of earnings by $2,000 each year for the next 5 above the indexing under current law. In total, exempt amounts would increase by more than $2,500 per year. The earnings test would increase to over $23,000 by 1995, more than double the current exempt amount.

Delayed retirement credit (DRC).—The DRC is intended to compensate Social Security beneficiaries for benefits lost because retirement has been delayed. Recent estimates indicate that a fair DRC adjustment is an 8-percent benefit increase for each year retirement is delayed. The current DRC is 3 percent per year, and being increased very gradually. Our legislation would increase the DRC more quickly so it reaches 8 percent by 1995, not in 2004 as under current law.

SSI benefit expansions.—Our bill provides for a basic benefit increase of $3 per month for individuals and $5 per month for couples. A second proposal in our bill would count the lesser of the actual value of in-kind benefits or the current one-third reduction rule against a beneficiary's SSI benefits. The "one-third" rule requires an individual living in another's household and receiving in-kind support from that household to have their SSI benefits reduced by one-third. These features are included to help the lowest income elderly, regardless of whether they work or not.

We have also included three proposals to more than offset the costs of the changes alone. Described more completely in the bill description, these proposals include broadening the base for Social Security coverage, eliminating certain retroactive benefits and allowing tax refund offsets to occur in certain circumstances.

Though every offset is difficult these days, these are proposals that all justified to finance the easing of the Social Security earnings test. Our working seniors deserve such an effort.

By Mr. KERRY (for himself, Mr. GORE, and Mr. PELL):

S. 2575. A bill to urge the Secretary of State to negotiate a ban on mineral resource activities in Antarctica, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

ANTARCTICA PROTECTION ACT

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, yesterday over 200 legislators from more than 42 nations concluded the first ever Interparliamentary Conference on the Environment. Resolutions dealing with a sweeping range of environmental issues from global warming to protecting our oceans and waterways were unanimously adopted. Furthermore, a document of legislative strategies to address many environmental issues was agreed to by the participating nations to take back to their respective congresses and parliaments in order to propose domestic legislation that will incorporate these principles into their own domestic policies.

I was the cochairman of the working group on ocean and water resources. In our group we discussed at length the issue of the future of the Antarctic with the helpful leadership of Capt. Jacques Cousteau. Our group, with representation from every hemisphere of the globe, agreed to protect the Antarctic, by extending the current moratorium on exploration and exploitation of mineral and energy resources until we are able to negotiate an ongoing prohibition among the Antarctica Treaty nations. We also agreed that we must grant Antarctica special protective status as a land of science reserve and international wilderness area.

The action taken yesterday at the Conference follows on the heels of Earth Day, when over 2 million citizens from around the globe came together to demonstrate their concern for the environmental future of this planet. These two events should send a very clear message—and that is, that economic and environmental policies are now the driving concern in our definition of national security.

Mr. President, the true measure of the importance of an event like Earth Day and yesterday's conference is not only the overwhelming demonstration that occurred on Earth Day, and the impressive consensus document that was agreed to at the international conference, but even more importantly, our ability and willingness to work to improve our environment through the steps we take in the week, months, and even years to come.

It is said that Earth Day was the kickoff for the newly dedicated "environmental decade of the nineties." Globally, we must translate the feeling of that day into practical sacrifices, substantive actions, and effective policies, to address the needs of the world's environmental safety.

Today, as a response to the feeling generated on Earth Day, and as a response to the specific legislative strategies adopted at the Interparliamentary Conference, I am introducing, along with my colleague, Senator GORE, legislation to protect the pristine and fragile environment of the Antarctic from the harmful effects of mineral mining and exploration. This legislation is companion legislation to a bill already introduced earlier this year by my good colleague from Massachusetts, Congressman SILVIO CONTE.

Mr. President, the Antarctic plays an important and unique role in our global ecosystem. Ninety percent of the Earth's ice and 70 percent of the Earth's fresh water are found there; it is an integral part of the Earth's climate system. The Antarctic supports large populations of marine life from krill and plankton to whales, seals, and sea birds. It holds untold answers to the Earth's evolution and the world's future climate.

In recent years, demand for access and use of resources in Antarctica has grown. As uses grow, so has the potential for environmental degradation. Oilspills and water pollution from toxic chemicals, raw sewage, and solid wastes have already been reported in this environmentally sensitive area.

If education about the environment has taught us anything, it is an increased awareness of the fragile relationships which sustain life on Earth. Today, we have just begun to understand the vital role the continent of Antarctica plays in regulating the Earth's temperature. In its still pristine state, Antarctica provides science with an as yet unsullied vantage point from which to monitor our changing planet. Too often across this great planet, we have destroyed environmental and scientific treasures, only to realize it when it was too late. Today, we face that challenge with Antarctica. It is imperative that policy markers worldwide protect it before damage is irreparable.

Much of Antarctica remains today as it has for millions of years. Barren and bountiful, a massive ice cap encases all but 2 percent of the continent, while the surrounding oceans brim with life. Unfortunately however, the value of this unique environment as the last wilderness and irreplaceable natural laboratory is under serious threat.

Currently, the United States and other nations face major policy decisions surrounding the development of the Antarctic. Traditionally, Antarctica has remained peaceful because it has few things to fight over. However, several countries are not interested in development. Development of oil and minerals, tourism, fisheries, and increased research, all which has lead to the debate of environmental protection versus inappropriate development.

Many scientists believe that development is likely to cause ice caps to melt, which would not only cause sea levels to rise, but would also reduce the ocean's absorption capacity for carbon dioxide. Currently, oceans take up one-third to one-half of the world's carbon dioxide emissions, which we know to be one of the main greenhouse gases. This change could add significantly to global climate change.

Oil and mineral development first because a concern in the early 1970's when we faced an oil crisis worldwide. Consequently, member nations of the Antarctic Treaty, recognizing the need to address the question of future development, came together to hammer out new rules governing oil and mineral exploration. This resulted in the Wellington Convention, which was agreed upon by the 20 treaty nations in 1988. The purpose of the agreement was to protect Antarctica from the dangerous environmental effects of oil and mineral development. The international agreement establishes a framework under which mining and drilling could take place in the most unspoiled environment on Earth.

Mr. President, while the Wellington Convention admittedly has strong environmental principles, such words, no matter how well-intentioned, will not be able to protect the Antarctic from the inevitable spills which occur when oil drilling takes place. We can look to the Exxon Valdez spill in Alaska or numerous others, all which have governing rules on how to transport oil, to see that man cannot escape from the consequences of his own actions no matter how well planned they may be. In my view, this agreement falls far short of its goal. More importantly however, two signatories, France and Australia, have already withdrawn their support from the agreement, and several other nations such as New Zealand will do so soon, and I urge our administration to do the same. Under the Antarctic Treaty system, all agreements must be unanimous. With the wise withdrawal of these nations there is greater need to adopt a new convention which will do as my bill suggests and prohibit mineral mining altogether.

The legislation that I am introducing today will provide the needed protection for Antarctica. It provides an ongoing prohibition on all mineral exploration and development in Antarctica by United States entities, and it directs the Secretary of State to urge other nations to take the same position. It also recommends that the Secretary of State ask other nations to adopt an international accord with grants Antarctica special status as an international reserve-land of science dedicated to wilderness protection, international cooperation, and scientific research.

Mr. President, Antarctica is one of the last examples of nature's untouched beauty. The legislation I am introducing today seeks to preserve that forever. I urge my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring the Antarctic Protection Act of 1990 which will guarantee that human activities in Antarctica be for the good of all and not something that we will regret in the future.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2575

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Antarctica Protection Act of 1990".

SEC. 2. DEFINITIONS.

For the purposes of this Act—

(1) the term "Antarctica" means the area of the Antarctic convergence as defined in section 303(1) of the Antarctic Marine Living Resources Act of 1984 (16 U.S.C. 2432);

(2) the term "mineral resources" means all nonliving natural nonrenewable resources;

(3) the term "person" means any individual, corporation, partnership, trust, association, or any other private entity existing or organized under the laws of the United States, or any officer, employee, agent, department, or other instrumentality of the Federal Government or of any State or political subdivision thereof, or of any foreign government or political subdivision subject to the jurisdiction of the United States; and

(4) the term "Secretary" means the Secretary of State.

SEC. 3. FINDINGS AND PURPOSES.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that—

(1) the Antarctic continent and its associated and dependent ecosystems is a distinctive environment providing a habitat for many unique species and offering a natural laboratory from which to monitor critical aspects of stratospheric ozone depletion and global climate change;

(2) Antarctica is protected by a series of international agreements, including the Antarctic Treaty and associated recommendations, the Convention on the Conservation of Antarctic Seals, and the Antarctic Marine Living Resources Convention which are intended to conserve the renewable natural resources of Antarctica and to recognize the importance of Antarctica for the conduct of scientific research;

(3) recurring and recent developments in Antarctica, including increased siting of scientific stations, poor waste disposal practices, oil spills, increased tourism, and the over-exploitation of marine living resources have resulted in serious questions about the adequacy of existing agreements to protect the Antarctic environment and its living marine resources;

(4) the parties to the Antarctic Treaty have recently negotiated a Convention on the Regulation of Antarctic Mineral Resource Activities which the United States has signed but not yet ratified;

(5) the Convention on the Regulation of Antarctic Mineral Resource Activities is not adequate to provide the necessary level of protection for the fragile environment of Antarctica and could actually stimulate movement toward commercial exploitation;

(6) the level of scientific study, including necessary support facilities has increased, in part to justify achieving the status of a consultative party under the Antarctic Treaty, to the point that some scientific programs may be degrading the Antarctic environment; and

(7) the planned 1990 special consultative meeting of parties to the Antarctica Treaty and the imminence of the thirtieth anniversary of the Antarctica Treaty provide opportunities for the United States to exercise leadership toward protection and sound management of Antarctica.

(b) PURPOSE.—It is the purpose of the Act to—

(1) strengthen substantially overall environmental protection of Antarctica;

(2) permanently prevent prospecting, exploration and development of Antarctic mineral resources by United States citizens and other persons or entities subject to the jurisdiction of United States laws; and

(3) urge other nations to join the United States in negotiating a new agreement to provide an ongoing prohibition on all minerals activities in Antarctica and comprehensive protection for Antarctica and its associated and dependent ecosystems.

SEC. 4. PROHIBITION ON ANTARCTIC MINERAL RESOURCE ACTIVITIES.

It is unlawful for any person to engage in, finance, directly or indirectly, or knowingly provide assistance to any Antarctic minerals resource activity.

SEC. 5. INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENT.

(a) It is the sense of the Congress that the Secretary of State should enter into negotiations with the consultative parties described in paragraphs (1) and (2) of Article IX of the Antarctica Treaty, done at Washington on December 1, 1959, for the purpose of concluding an international agreement—

(1) to prohibit Antarctic mineral resource activities by all nations;

(2) to grant Antarctica special protective status as an International Reserve-Land of Science dedicated to wilderness protection, international cooperation and scientific research;

(3) to conserve and protect permanently the natural environment of Antarctica and its associated and dependent ecosystems; and

(4) to ensure that the results of all scientific investigation relating to geological processes and structures be made openly available to the international scientific community, as required by the Antarctica Treaty.

(b) It is the sense of the Congress that any treaty or other international agreement submitted by the President to the Senate for its advice and consent to ratification relating to mineral resources or activities in Antarctica should be consistent with the purpose and provisions of this Act.

SEC. 6. ENVIRONMENTAL IMPACT ASSESSMENT OF UNITED STATES ACTIVITIES IN ANTARCTICA.

All activities conducted or sponsored in Antarctica by any agency of the United States Government or by any private or governmental entity receiving financial assistance from the United States Government shall comply with the provisions of section 102 of the National Environmental Policy Act of 1969 (42 U.S.C. 4332).

SEC. 7. PENALTIES.

(a) CIVIL.—(1) Any person who violates a provision of section 4 shall be liable to the United States for a civil penalty in an amount not to exceed $10,000 for each such violation.

(2)(A) A civil penalty for a violation of section 4 shall be assessed by the Secretary of State by an order made on the record after opportunity (provided in accordance with this subparagraph) for a hearing in accordance with section 554 of title 5, United States Code. Before issuing such an order, the Secretary shall give written notice to the person to be assessed a civil penalty under such order of the Secretary's proposal to issue such order and provide such person an opportunity to request, within 15 days of the date the notice is received by such person, such a hearing on the order.

(B) The Secretary may compromise, modify, or remit, with or without conditions, any civil penalty which may be imposed under this subsection.

(3) Any person who requested in accordance with paragraph (2)(A) a hearing respecting the assessment of a civil penalty and who is aggrieved by an order assessing a civil penalty may file a petition for judicial review of such order with the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit or for any other circuit in which such person resides or transacts business.

(4) If any person fails to pay an assessment of a civil penalty—

(A) after the order making the assessment has become a final order and if such person does not file a petition for judicial review of the order in accordance with paragraph (3), or

(B) after a court in an action brought under paragraph (3) has entered a final judgment in favor of the Secretary, the Secretary shall recover the amount assessed plus interest in an action brought in any appropriate district court of the United States. In such an action, the penalty shall not be subject to review.

(b) CRIMINAL.—Any person who knowingly or willfully violates any provision of section 4 shall, in addition to or in lieu of any civil penalty which may be imposed under subsection (a) of this section for such violation, be subject, upon conviction, to a fine in accordance with 18 United States Code, or to imprisonment for not more than 5 years, or both.

By Mr. METZENBAUM:

S. 2576. A bill to revise the orphan drug provisions of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act and the Orphan Drug Act, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

S. 2577. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1986, to extend the credit for clinical testing expenses for certain drugs, for rare diseases or conditions, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

ORPHAN DRUG LEGISLATION

● Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I rise to introduce two bills which I will refer to as the Orphan Drug Amendments of 1990.

These bills amend the Orphan Drug Act which was adopted, in 1983, to encourage the development of drugs for rare diseases—illnesses affecting less than 200,000 people. The act provides financial incentives for our pharmaceutical industry to invest in drugs that would otherwise go undeveloped. These drugs include drugs that would be unprofitable due to the small patient populations that would use them, as well as drugs that would generate such small profits as to be unattractive economic initiatives.

The act's financial incentives include 7 years of marketing exclusivity, during which time no other company is allowed to market the same drug for the same rare disease, a grant program and a tax credit. Authorization for the grant program expires at the end of fiscal year 1990 and authorization for the tax credit expires at the end of calendar year 1990.

The act has been a tremendous success in assuring that patients with rare diseases finally receive treatment. Since 1983, the Food and Drug Administration [FDA] has granted 333 orphan designations and approved 42 orphan drugs. Of the 42 approved orphan drugs, 8 are for populations of less than 1,000; 18 are for populations of less than 10,000; and only 6 are for populations of more than 50,000. They include such important drugs as hemin for the treatment of porphyria, digibind for the treatment of digitalis toxicity, and gancyclovir for the treatment of cytomegolavirus retinitis—a sight-threatening complication of patients with AIDS. Clearly, the act has given thousands upon thousands of desperately ill people hope for survival and freedom from pain.

When we passed the Orphan Drug Act, we were hopeful it would make a difference. After 7 years of experience, it is now clear that the act has generated far more interest in the development of orphan drugs than anyone envisioned. Simply put, the Orphan Drug Act is a wonderful success story for those with rare diseases, for our drug companies, for the Food and Drug Administration and for the Congress.

The Orphan Drug Amendments of 1990 will help ensure that the development of drug treatments for rare diseases not only continues, but continues in a more effective manner. The bill reauthorizes the Orphan Drug Grant Program which supports research for those drugs that no company will sponsor. Since the inception of the act, more than 70 grants have been awarded. The reauthorization of the grant program will help ensure that pivotal clinical tests are conducted on the most difficult orphan drugs.

The bill also corrects two problems which have developed with the act. First, the AIDS epidemic has made clear that some drugs will have patient populations that increase with time and eventually exceed the statutory definition limit of 200,000. Under current law there is no mechanism for denying financial incentives to an approved orphan drug when its patient population exceeds 200,000 during the 7-year exclusive marketing period. This bill allows for a product to lose its marketing exclusivity once its patient population exceeds 200,000.

The second problem involves those very few drugs which meet the orphan drug definition, but generate tremendous sales nevertheless.

Under current law, if several companies are simultaneously researching and developing the same drug to treat the same rare disease, the first drug to obtain FDA approval is awarded the 7-year exclusive marketing benefit. This situation has occurred only infrequently, but because of the very high prices that can be charged for some drugs, there have been several cases where multiple companies have sought approval of the same drug for the same disease. In this small number of cases, marketing exclusivity may have resulted in higher prices than if competing products had been allowed on the market. This bill provides for market competition by allowing for approval for all companies that were simultaneously developing the same drug for the same rare disease drug.

Although the act has gone a long way in promoting the development of drugs to treat rare diseases, there still is need for better coordination of the various Government agencies that are involved with orphan drugs and rare diseases. Toward this goal, the Orphan Drug Amendments of 1990 will replace the current interagency task force, known as the Orphan Products Board, with an Office for Orphan and Rare Diseases and Conditions within the Office of the Assistant Secretary of Health.

Finally, the second of these two bills will extend the current tax credit for orphan drug human clinical testing expenses for 3 additional years. In addition, it expands the credit to cover expenses associated with animal studies necessary to orphan drug approval.●

By Mr. D'AMATO (for himself, Mr. DECONCINI, Mr. MACK, Mr. HELMS, and Mr. SPECTER):

S. 2579. A bill to amend the Export Administration Act of 1979; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

EXPORT ADMINISTRATION ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, today I introduce a bill on behalf of myself, Senator DECONCINI, Senator MACK, Senator HELMS, and Senator SPECTER. It deals with an announcement which the administration made as it relates to high-technology exports to the Soviet Union.

Mr. President, while the struggle for freedom and liberation is taking place today in Lithuania, the announcement of relaxation of export controls is ill timed. I am not suggesting to you that at no time should the United States lift the embargo on high technology to the Soviet Union. But I am suggesting that lifting controls now certainly sends a signal, the wrong signal, and does not encourage a process of negotiation and peaceful change.

The bill which I am introducing would halt the relaxation of controls on high-technology exports to the Soviet Union until the administration certifies to Congress the following: First, that the Soviet Union has lifted its economic embargo against Lithuania, and second, that the Soviet Union has entered into negotiations with the duly elected representatives of the Lithuanian people with the intended result that the recognition of the independence of the Government of Lithuania will take place in an orderly and expeditious manner.

In other words, it is up to the administration to certify that the economic embargo against Lithuania has ended and that the Soviets are negotiating in good faith.

Mr. President, the President will have that right to make that certification. It will not be a judgment that is make by any one or collective group of Senators. I believe that we have an obligation to say to the Soviets that we are not going to reward you while you are mugging the people of Lithuania, when you are mugging freedom. Strength and perseverance has brought us to a point where we can relax economic sanctions, give most-favored-nation status, but only when and until the rights of all people are adhered to.

Mr. President, today I had the opportunity of meeting with the Prime Minister of Lithuania, a gracious woman, a fine leader, and she made some observations. I would like to share them. She said:

It is difficult for the West to perceive that pressuring the Soviet Union on the Lithuanian question helps rather than hinders Mr. Gorbachev to be a consistent practitioner of democracy; more than that, to overcome the reactionary forces which oppose not only independence for the Baltic States but also political and economic reforms in general.

I find it rather interesting and rather sad that somehow we have come to a point of view that standing up for what is right is considered not to be fashionable and is considered to be risky business. Certainly the Prime Minister of Lithuania understands and knows of what she speaks.

I am just going to share one other sentiment she expressed. It goes right to what I call Gorbymania. Listen to what she states:

I do not contend that Mr. Gorbachev's preferred scenario for Lithuania coincides with Lithuania's own aspirations. I think that he would speak out for Lithuania remaining in federation, although not by force.

Listen to this:

However, even the world's darling does not have the monopolistic right to decide the fate of other nations.

Even Mr. Gorbachev, who we suddenly have said we cannot do anything to imperil, even if it is speaking out for freedom, which she says very poignantly. She says:

And here we cannot help him at all. For otherwise sympathy regenerates into toadyism, and the latter gives birth to a cult.

I am suggesting that is exactly what we are doing. We can say to Mr. Gorbachev if you end your economic aggression against Lithuania we will reward you at the end of that process with most-favored-nation status and yes, we will change the rules as they relate to Cocom and you will be entitled to the kinds of materials, the kinds of sensitive equipment, the kinds of technology that you have never heretofore had.

I think that the Prime Minister of Lithuania is absolutely right. A nation as the United States should not be building a policy on one individual.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 5 of the Export Administration Act of 1979 (50 U.S.C. App. 2404) is amended by adding at the end the following:

"(r) REMOVAL OF CONTROLS.—On or after May 1, 1990, the President may not revise the list of goods or technology subject to export controls under this section or take any other action with respect to export controls under this section that would decontrol exports to the Soviet Union prior to the date on which the President transmits to the Congress certification that—

"(1) the Soviet Union has lifted its economic embargo against Lithuania, and

"(2) the Soviet Union has entered into negotiations with the duly elected representatives of the Lithuanian people, with the intended result the Soviet recognition of the independence of the government of the Republic of Lithuania in an orderly and expeditious manner.".

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, yesterday the White House announced its intention to propose to the Coordinating Committee for Multilateral Export Controls [Cocom] a relaxation of restrictions on transfers of technology to the Soviet Union. The legislation being offered today by the able Senator from New York [Mr. D'AMATO]—which I am pleased to cosponsor—would effectively prevent the removal of such restrictions until the Soviet Union lifts its economic embargo of Lithuania and enters into negotiations with elected Lithuanian leaders regarding that Baltic country's redeclaration of independence.

I respectfully hope that President Bush will reconsider the proposed relaxation of restrictions on techology transfers to the Soviet Union. At this very moment, the Soviet Union is still producing strategic offensive weapons systems—including ballistic missiles, nuclear weapons, and submarines. There is no strategic justification to allow the Soviet Union access to the Western production equipment and technology necessary to produce these weapons systems.

The decision announced yesterday will allow the Soviets to close the qualitative gap on which United States defense strategy has depended for decades and to which the American people have contributed billions of their hard-earned tax bollars.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the White House announcement proposing relaxed Cocom restrictions be inserted in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY THE PRESS SECRETARY

The President is recommending to the Coordinating Committee for Multilateral Export Controls (COCOM) that significant changes be made in the list of technologies subject to export control. For over 40 years, COCOM controls have helped the Allies protect our technological achievements from being exported to our adversaries. The President initiated a comprehensive study of these controls in January to reflect the changes in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union, as well as other military priorities that have emerged in the last year or more. The President has concluded that a complete overhaul of the control list is warranted. Therefore, the United States will recommend to COCOM the developement by the end of 1990 a new core list of goods and technologies that is far shorter and less restrictive than the present list.

The President's proposals will continue to protect our advanced technology from being exported to the Soviet Union and other adversaries. In effect, our proposals will build "high fences around fewer goods" by focusing on those items that are the most sensitive in terms of our national security. We will be able to pinpoint a streamlined list of exports that can make a major contribution to Soviet power, while changing the restrictions on items such as personal computers which are readily available throughout the world anyway.

We will propose that of the 120 categories on COCOM's industrial list, 30 will be eliminated completely and the scope of another 13 will be reduced substantially. These changes reflect specific analysis by the Department of Defense that identifies technology of crucial importance to weapons production in the Soviet Union and other countries. They have the unanimous support of all security agencies. Careful study indicates that most of the goods and technolgoies that we currently control to Eastern Europe and Soviet destinations, are of low strategic value and should be decontrolled. These categories include computers, telecommunications equipment, and machine tools. More specifically, these categories will include off-the-shelf personal computers and some mainframe computers for use in banking, airline reservations, etc.

We are proposing greater access for Eastern Europe to modern fiber optics equipment and some microwave telecommunications systems. Access to this technology is dependent on adoption of safegurads against diversion, such as identification of authorized uses, and verification inspections.

The United States will begin consultations immediately with our Allies on these changes. We think it is crucial to be able to provide maximum protection of our highly sensitive technologies, while at the same time giving the Eastern Europeans access to technologies desperately needed to improve their infrastructre and modernize their industrial plants.

By Mr. SHELBY:

S.J. Res. 304. Joint resolution to designate October 17, 1990, as "National Drug-Free Schools and Communities Education and Awareness Day"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL DRUG-FREE SCHOOLS AND COMMUNITIES EDUCATION AND AWARENESS DAY

Mr. SHELBY. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce a joint resolution that designates October 17, 1990, as "National Drug-Free Schools and Communities Education and Awareness Day." In summary, the resolution states that education and public awareness are necessary to prevent our children and young people from entering into cycles of drug abuse. The Federal Government must enter into true parternships with communities nationwide to work together to address the drug abuse problem that confronts our country.

On April 30, 1990, the National Commission on Drug-Free Schools, of which I am a member, held a hearing at Robert E. Lee High School in Montgomery, AL. Attendees at the hearing included members of the religious community, parents, teachers and administrators, community organizations, and law enforcement officials. The hearing concentrated on the issue of education as a preventive tool, and the issue of teaching effective decision-making to our young people.

During the hearing, the visible commitment from Alabamians to be active participants in the war on drugs was most impressive. We in Government cannot allow the community spirit to be diminished. We must do all that we prudently can to make our country, our communities drug-free zones. For the well-being of all Americans, the existing, but diminishing drug problem must be tackled on all fronts.

Statistics reveal that our children are not strangers to drugs. According to the National Institute on Drug Abuse's high school survey, released in February, 1990, one of every two high school seniors will use an illegal drug before he or she graduates. The survey stated that 35.4 percent of our high school seniors used drugs in the last year and 19.7 percent in the previous month. While these numbers show improvement from the previous year's survey, we still have a long way to go.

Drug abuse destroys its victims. While certain members of our society are at higher risk of becoming drug abusers, the cost of such abuse is borne by everyone. The toll on society can be measured in many ways: through deaths, injuries and disabilities; diminished workforce productivity; increased demands on our health care system, schools, social welfare programs, law enforcement agencies, judicial and corrective systems, and increased violence.

Mr. President, how are we as a community to deal with the harsh reality of drug use? Education is the key. There is a definite correlation between negative attitudes toward drugs and actual drug use.

Education, therefore, is the crucial element in ending the drug abuse cycle for our children and young people before it starts. Prevention activities create an environment where people need not turn to drugs to escape other problems, where we as a community provide opportunities and alternatives to drug abuse, and where drug abuse is neither encouraged nor tolerated.

These goals cannot be achieved by any single group. We need a comprehensive approach to bring together community leaders, parents, teachers, citizens, law enforcement officials, social service providers, and policy makers. A successful prevention program requires public awareness, education, and understanding.

Within my State of Alabama, a number of impressive programs exist where our citizens are working with all segments of the community to create a drug-free Alabama. Many programs act as resources and referral systems and serve as speakers bureaus which match schools and other organizations with appropriate speakers on substance abuse.

We cannot afford to ignore existing and potential drug abuse in our communities because it is our problem—our responsibility. The war on drugs, like every other war can only be won with everyone pulling their weight.

Additionally, we must recognize that drug use is not confined to young people in certain geographic areas or from particular economic backgrounds. Many young people throughout the country have succumbed to drug use. Thus to break the tide of drug use we must develop comprehensive measures that teach a no-use of drug message, incorporates social responsibility, and provides an alternative to drug use.

Drug abuse is not solely an urban problem. Our rural areas are also touched by the painful and destructive consequences of drug and alcohol abuse. Rural America is home to more than 25 percent of the Nation's population. By virtually every measure rural America is poorer than the Nation as a whole. Thus there is a compelling case for providing additional resources to address the problem of drug use in rural areas. During the coming months I plan to move forward on initiatives that will assist our rural communities in fighting the scourge of drugs.

Mr. President, as a member of the National Commission on Drug-Free Schools, I have been made aware of several significant and successful programs and initiatives. The more I learn, the more I am convinced that the better approach to defeating the scourge of drugs is through building linkages throughout entire communities. We need to combine our efforts to share our expertise and insights. We need to prevent duplication so that we can reach and serve the varying needs of all our citizens.

Each community must become an active participant in the war on drugs. The goal of a drug-free America cannot be achieved by any single group. Drug abuse is everyone's problem and everyone is needed to be part of the solution.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to become cosponsors of the joint resolution.

By Mr. SIMON (for himself, Mr. PELL, Mr. METZENBAUM, Mr. DODD, Mr. KENNEDY, and Mr. JEFFORDS):

S.J. Res. 306. Joint resolution to designate the period commencing October 21, 1990, and ending October 27, 1990, as "National Humanities Week"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL HUMANITIES WEEK

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I am pleased to introduce today, in concert with Representative MARY ROSE OAKAR, a joint resolution declaring October 21 to 27 of this year as National Humanities Week. I would like to thank Senator CLAIBORNE PELL, Senator EDWARD KENNEDY, Senator HOWARD METZENBAUM, Senator CHRISTOPHER DODD, and Senator JEFFORDS for joining me as original cosponsors of this joint resolution.

A recent National Endowment for the Humanities study found that two-thirds of American 17-year-olds did not know when the American Civil War occurred. How can we, as a country, expect to compete in a global economy without an understanding of where we've been and what we've accomplished? We must break free from the slavery of ignorance. An understanding of history is essential, if we are to understand and direct the present and plan for the future.

Mr. President, the State Humanities Councils are the bridge to the people from the National Endowment. They provide the resources and the inspiration for Americans to expand their understanding of human experience. I would like to tell you about one paradigmatic project in particular that the Illinois State Humanities Council supported.

The Illinois project is devoted to a subject near and dear to me, to Illinois, and to America—Abraham Lincoln. The project is the Great American People Show [GAPS] in New Salem, IL. GAPS is a wonderful ongoing program that produces original historical dramas concened with Illinois heritage, leaders, and writers featuring Abraham Lincoln. Every year, thousands of people from Illinois and the Nation attend the productions, and many, in fact, plan their summer vacations around the event.

The GAPS project as well as other humanities projects not only entertain, they inspire learning. Many a child's curiosity about their position in the historical scheme of things has been piqued by the dramatization of an historical event, or by an exhibit in a museum. Their interest often leads to a higher sense of self-esteem.

Mr. President, as you know, I have been a strong advocate for education. In the structure of a strong solid education, the study of the humanities is the mortar, locking together core academic disciplines, providing the foundation for a complete and wide understanding of the past, the present, and the future. If America is going to remain a top competitor, then we need to do a better job educating our citizens in the humanities. National Humanities Week will provide the background for a national focus on the importance of the humanities, in addition to celebrating the National Endowment for the Humanities 25th anniversary.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to join me in support of National Humanities Week.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 126—RELATIVE TO AN EXTENSION OF THE BAN ON COMMERCIAL WHALING

Mr. LIEBERMAN (for Mr. PELL, for himself, Mr. LIEBERMAN, Mr. SARBANES, Mr. BIDEN, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, Mr. GORE, Mr. DODD, Mr. CRANSTON, and Mr. KERRY) submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

S. CON. RES. 126

Whereas whales are a unique marine resource of great esthetic and scientific interest and are a vital part of the marine ecosystem;

Whereas the indefinite moratorium on commercial whale killing adopted by the International Whaling Commission in 1982 to take effect in 1986 is subject to review and reconsideration in 1990;

Whereas this moratorium has not yet resulted in a full cessation of whale killing for commerce;

Whereas there remain great uncertainties as to the true status of whale populations, due to the difficulty of studying them, their slow reproductive rate, and the unpredictability of their recovery even when fully protected;

Whereas whales are subject to grave environmental threats from nonhunting causes such as pollution, loss of habitat, increased shipping, oil and gas exploration, and the use of driftnets and other nonselective fishing techniques, which underscore the need for special safeguards for whale survival;

Whereas the International Whaling Commission has not yet demonstrated its capability for strict and truly international monitoring and enforcement, and for insistence on humane killing methods;

Whereas powerful moral and ethical questions have been raised regarding the killing of whales, for profit; and

Whereas a full decade free of whale killing for commercial purposes is the bare minimum necessary to seek satisfactory answers to the questions, concerns, and uncertainties cited above: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress that—

(1) United States policy should promote the maximum conservation and protection of the world's whale populations;

(2) toward that goal, the United States should work to continue the International Whaling Commission moratorium on the commercial killing of whales and maintain zero catch limits for all whale stocks for at least another decade, that is, to the year 2000 or beyond;

(2) in addition, the United States should work to strengthen the International Whaling Commission as the indispensable organization for safeguarding for future generations the great natural resources represented by the whale stocks, and should encourage the Commission to establish and carry out long-term programs of nonlethal research and comprehensive assessment for all whale stocks on a global basis, including small cetaceans; and

(4) in so promoting the conservation and protection of the world's whale populations, the United States should make the fullest use of diplomatic channels, appropriate domestic and international law, and all other available means.

● Mr. PELL. Mr. President, today along with Senator LIEBERMAN and six other colleagues, I am submitting a concurrent resolution calling for an extension of the moratorium on commercial whaling until the year 2000. At this time, I would like to express my particular thanks to Senator LIEBERMAN who has played a key role in bringing this resolution into being.

Since 1972, U.S. policy has been to achieve a long-term moratorium on commercial whaling. That year, 10 days after the semiannual Stockholm conference on the environment, the United States first proposed a 10-year moratorium on commercial whaling. Unfortunately, the proposal was defeated.

It was only in 1986 that objective of a full moratorium on commercial was achieved.

Now, in 1990, the IWC is preparing to meet to assess the effect of the moratorium on whale stocks and to consider possible modifications to the moratorium.

In my view, this moratorium should be continued for at least another 10 years. Last year, the IWC released a report indicating that the populations of some whale species are much smaller than previously thought. The decline in the blue whale's population, the Earth's largest animal, was particularly serious, but the population of other species was also found to be far below the expected levels.

Mr. President, in light of these findings, I believe it is crucially important that we continue the moratorium on commercial whaling so as to ensure that this majestic family of animals survives into the 21st century.●

Mr. LIEBERMAN. Mr. President, thank you.

I am proud to rise to join with the senior Senator from Rhode Island, Senator CLAIBORNE PELL, in submitting a concurrent resolution which I have sent to the desk to extend to the year 2000 the international moratorium on the commercial killing of the whales.

Mr. President, timely adoption of this concurrent resolution will send a message to the International Whaling Commission when it meets in June to reconsider the moratorium on the killing of whales which is presently in place. That moratorium, which has been labeled "indefinite," was to give the Whaling Commission 10 years in which to study the world's whale population. By 1990, this year, it was supposed to know whether the cessation of whaling had enabled the whaling population to come back. But according to the New York Times on June 20 of last year a decade-long study by scientists working off the coast of Antarctica found only 453 blue whales in an area where they had expected to find perhaps 10 times that many.

The article goes on to charge that even this figure may be misleading and calls into question some of the methods that have been used to assess our precious world whale population.

To end the moratorium before the International Whaling Commission has gathered the scientific information necessary to determine whether or not commercial whaling is one of the factors pushing whales to the brink of extinction seems to me to be irresponsible.

But there are other reasons to extend this moratorium. The first is that the indefinite status of the moratorium enabled the nations that wanted to kill whales for profit to revisit that issue every year, placing a tremendous drain on those who wanted to be assured that commercial whaling would not place too much of a burden on the whale population.

The second problem is that despite the moratorium, the fact is that the killing of whales has never stopped. Whales are routinely killed for loosely defined scientific reasons and because of a lack of a strong management structure and a lack of enforcement capability by the International Whaling Commission, many killings went on unchecked and in defiance of this moratorium.

Mr. President, this Congress, through the Marine Mammal Protection Act and Endangered Species Act, has already made its views known on the need to protect whales. In the past five American Presidents, Nixon, Ford, Carter, Reagan, and Bush, have all made strong statements in support for whale conservation. The present moratorium is official American policy.

This concurrent resolution therefore would simply lend support to the extension of that policy and it would urge our administration to take a step further, to call for and promote the maximum conservation and protection of whales, to strengthen the International Whaling Commission, and to make use of our powerful diplomatic ties and the appropriate American and international laws to achieve those ends.

Mr. President, this has special significance for us in Connecticut because whaling is an important part of Connecticut's history. One of our State's biggest tourist attractions today is Mystic Seaport which is a reconstructed whaling village that features an actual whaling ship. But that heritage of Connecticut has yielded and given birth to a present-day concern about the health of the world's whale population. That concern was made manifest when our State legislature named the sperm whale as our State animal. The people of Connecticut, some of whose ancestors actually went to sea in search of whales to kill, have now joined ranks with those who want to save one of the greatest of God's creatures.

Personally, Mr. President, I would like to see not a moratorium, or even an extension of a moratorium on the commercial killing of whales. I would like to see a ban, an end, period; no more killing of the world's whales.

It is unconscionable to me that there are still those who persist in killing these great animals for profit. Nevertheless, it seems obvious to me that the decisions we make are only as persuasive as the bases upon which we make them. In this case, therefore, I bow to science as the mediator of our judgment. But I ask in this concurrent resolution that it be true science and that it be given the time and room in which to work, time and room in which we should do all we can to protect the world's whale population.

● Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, I am pleased to be a cosponsor of this concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 126) calling for the United States to actively promote an extension of the world moratorium on whaling. I have been a longtime opponent of commercial whaling and believe that this resolution will enhance the global protection and conservation of whale populations.

World whaling is regulated voluntarily through the International Whaling Commission [IWC]. Since its creation, the IWC's objectives have gradually shifted from regulating whale harvests to conserving whale populations. An IWC moratorium on whaling was agreed to in 1982 and went into effect in 1986. Unfortunately, commercial whaling has not stopped. Several nations continue their activities under the guise of scientific research, an activity that is allowed under the moratorium. The moratorium will be reviewed by the IWC this year.

The United States played an integral role in obtaining the IWC moratorium and has actively pushed to restrict lethal scientific research. However, we have not exerted enough pressure on nations to stop whaling, often allowing their activities to continue without proper sanctions.

The resolution that we are introducing today calls for the U.S. Government to take action to extend the IWC moratorium for 10 years and to actively promote the conservation and protection of world whale populations through diplomatic channels and international laws. Let us hope that through these types of efforts, we can put an end to the killing of these unique mammals that we need to protect.

The public's concern for protection of the Earth and its resources is growing. Two weeks ago, 200 million people gathered worldwide on Earth Day to pronounce their desire for environmental protection. In Massachusetts today we are celebrating Whale Awareness Day.

And this week, Mr. President, the first Interparliamentary Conference on the Global Environment was held. Over 200 legislators from 42 countries gathered to define the strategies that parliamentarians should take to protect our global environment. These strategies covered a wide range of problems from global warming to protecting biodiversity. As chair of the Oceans and Water Resources session, I am pleased to report that we identified strengthening the IWC moratorium and reducing whaling under scientific permit as major actions that must be taken.●

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

NATIONAL COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT WEEK, 1990

● Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, the Community Development Block Grant Program is an essential tool in the national effort to improve America's communities. Yet, despite its effectiveness and popularity, the Reagan and Bush administrations have consistently sought to cut funding for CDBG. I have opposed these cuts, and I will continue to do so.

Recently, Mayor Patrick Pasculli of the city of Hoboken, NJ, sent me a copy of a resolution expressing Hoboken's support for the CDBG program. It is an excellent resolution that deserves the serious consideration of my colleagues. I hope they will take the opportunity to read it.

Mr. President, I ask that a copy of the resolution be included in the RECORD at this point.

The resolution follows:

1990 NATIONAL COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT WEEK RESOLUTION

Whereas the week of April 7-14, 1990, has been designated as National Community Development Week, the City of Hoboken is a participant in the Hudson County Urban County Community Development Program which funds a myriad of social service, economic development and housing programs in the City of Hoboken, and

Whereas the City of Hoboken and in communities throughout the nation, sixteen years of Community Development Block Grant program funding has developed a strong working network of relationships between the City of Hoboken, residents of Community Development target neighborhoods and the many nonprofit agencies which provide services and help make possible our commitment to those neighborhoods, and

Whereas the City of Hoboken recognizes that the Community Development Block Grant program is a partnership of Federal, local government, nonprofit and community efforts, and that the services funded by the Federal CDBG program, administered by the City of Hoboken and often delivered by local nonprofit organizations, relies heavily on the dedication and goodwill of our combined efforts; Therefore be it

Resolved, That during National Community Development Week 1990, the City of Hoboken will give special thanks and recognition to all participants whose hard work and devotion to the neighborhoods and their low and moderate income residents help insure the quality and effectiveness of the Community Development Block Grant program, and be it further

Resolved, That the City of Hoboken along with the service providers and others whose names are appended to this resolution, hereby petition the U.S. Congress and Administration to recognize the outstanding work being done locally and nationally by the Community Development Block Grant program, its vital importance to the community and to the people who live in its lower income neighborhoods, and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be conveyed to the appropriate elected and appointed officials in the Federal government and that the City of Hoboken's name and the names of its nonprofit service providers, be added to the roll of those committed to the preservation and full funding of the Community Development Block Grant and maintenance of its essential features over the course of the next Congress.●

JOHN SPARLING, SMALL BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION'S MINNESOTA DISTRICT VETERANS ADVOCATE FOR 1990

● Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I would like to take this opportunity to say a few words about a fine business leader who has devoted many years assisting in the development and growth of small businesses. I am speaking of John Sparling, director of the Small Business Development Center at Pine Technical College in Pine City, MN.

Mr. Sparling has just been chosen as the Small Business Administration's Minnesota District Veterans Advocate of 1990. Throughout his career at Pine Technical College, John has been instrumental in directing efforts for service veterans seeking to be entrepreneurs. In April 1989, he developed and led a veterans conference which was videotaped for use by veterans groups across the State and Nation.

Mr. Sparling espouses the entrepreneurial spirit that is so necessary to establishing and developing a small business. It is through his encouragement and support that many veterans have become small business owners. His commitment to the community is being recognized today as he is chosen as the Small Business Administration's Minnesota District Veterans Advocate of 1990. I congratulate his efforts and wish him continued success.●

THE ANNIVERSARY OF POLISH CONSTITUTION

● Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, 199 years ago today, the Polish Parliament adopted its first constitution—one of the first constitutions in Europe. Sadly, that constitution was short lived: Austria, Prussia, and Russia responded to Poland's drive for democracy by partitioning her.

Nevertheless, the justifiable pride of the Polish people in their constitution endured. Throughout years of repression, Poles continued to demonstrate on this anniversary, in remembrance of the democracy they once had, and would someday have again. Today, the hope and endurance of the Polish people lives on. Remarkably, the Poles, who have so little of their own and face serious economic difficulties as they completely restructure their system, have recently begun to organize food and other basic necessities to send to the people of Lithuania.

Against this otherwise positive picture, it is deeply regrettable that West German Chancellor Kohl continues to make statements which lead one to question his commitment to respect Poland's western borders. Even more disturbing, French President Mitterand now seems to be back-tracking on his country commitment. According to the Washington Post last week, President Mitterand suggested that the manner in which the border issue is resolved will be left up to Kohl. Such a suggestion is a departure from France's previous support of Poland and, I believe, counterproductive in the long run.

Mr. President, may I state again for the record: Poland's borders are inviolable and can only be changed by peaceful means. To suggest anything else is to go against the fundamental principles of the Helsinki Final Act. Moreover, Chancellor Kohl's suggestion that West Germany's treaty commitments will not be binding on a reunited Germany undermines all of West Germany's treaty commitments, including its bilateral and multilateral economic obligations and its military commitments within NATO. I urge Chancellor Kohl to put this concern to rest by clearly and unequivocally supporting Poland's current borders.

Matters such as this will not just go away if ignored. If we have not learned this, then we have learned nothing from history. This issue must be addressed squarely and it must be addressed soon, or it may derail the healing which is taking place in Central Europe today.●

RONALD E. SCHMITZ—MINNESOTA SMALL BUSINESS PERSON OF THE YEAR

● Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, May 7 through May 13 is Small Business Week. As you know, there are 19 million small businesses whose contribution to our economic well-being is significant. I would like to take this opportunity to say a few words about one fine business leader who has devoted many years assisting in the development and growth of small businesses. I am speaking of Ronald E. Schmitz, president of Ron's Cabinets, Inc., in Sauk Rapids, MN.

Mr. Schmitz has just been chosen as the Small Business Administration's Minnesota Small Business Person of the Year. As president of his 15-year old company, Mr. Schmitz has made significant contributions to the Sauk Rapids community. Mr. Schmitz bought an existing cabinetry shop in 1975, and developed it into a major regional manufacturer of wooden cabinets. He started out with 4 employees and currently employs 55. The growth of his company has been attributed to quality products at competitive prices and complete and timely customer service.

Mr. Schmitz espouses the entrepreneurial spirit that is so necessary to establishing and developing a successful small business. His commitment and contribution to the community is being recognized today as he is chosen as the Small Business Administration's Minnesota Small Business Person of the Year. I congratulate him for his efforts and wish him continued success.●

OPPORTUNITIES IN THE DEFENSE AND SPACE TALKS

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, with so much to consider in current Soviet-American relations, including fast-paced arms control talks like START and CFE, we sometimes overlook the work of our other negotiators in Geneva and Vienna. But these people are doing important work to build a safer world for all of us. Today, I would like to call the attention of my colleagues to emerging opportunities in the defense and space talks underway in Geneva.

Frankly, our defense and space negotiators have a tougher task than many of their colleagues. They are not talking about reducing already existing forces, but about restructuring the future of deterrence in a new and more stable way. It is slow and painstaking work, but the potential payoff is large: The first cooperative transition in the history of United States-Soviet strategic relations.

We are not going to witness such a historic breakthrough in the coming weeks. Still, opportunities which would have been starting just 1 year ago are emerging in the defense and space talks. A U.S. proposal for what are called predictability measures may soon become a reality.

Secrecy is often the most destabilizing aspect of Soviet strategic policy. Openness makes the United States-Soviet strategic relationship more predictable, lessening the prospect of miscalculation and surprise. To shed comparable light on both sides' ballistic missile defense activities, the United States has proposed a set of predictability measures: Annual data exchanges, meetings of experts, briefings, visits to laboratories, observations of tests, and notifications of test satellites.

There is a fair amount of agreement on these measures, but there is still much work to be done. Secretary of State Baker underscored his personal interest in such predictability measures at last fall's Wyoming meetings with Soviet Foreign Minister Shevardnadze when he invited Soviet scientists to visit two United States laboratories conducting SDI research. The Soviet scientists visited laboratories in California and New Mexico last December, and they came to recognize the value of such visits to laboratories as a predictability measure. When the Soviet negotiators returned to Geneva, they accepted this United States proposal.

Just a few weeks ago, U.S. negotiators to the defense and space talks proposed a followup, this time for both sides to run through all the predictability measures for one project on each side. Then, at the recent Washington meetings with Soviet Foreign Minister Shevardnadze, Secretary Baker again took the lead by proposing an early agreement on the full package of predictability measures.

Mr. President, this is not to suggest that there are no problems in the defense and space talks. Nor would I suggest that there are no differences between the two sides on predictability measures. There are. But I would suggest that some rather remarkable opportunities are emerging, and that we should be familiar with them.

Ambassador Dave Smith, who served for several years on the Senate staff, laid out clearly the problems and opportunities in his recent statement to the Geneva Conference on Disarmament. His brief statement provides a thoughtful and informative glimpse into the defense and space talks.

I commend it to my colleagues and ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

The statement follows:

STATEMENT BY AMBASSADOR DAVID J. SMITH

I

Mr. President, I appreciate this opportunity to share with the Conference on Disarmament our perspectives on the Defense and Space negotiations. My predecessor, Ambassador Cooper, spoke with you last August. Since then several positive developments have occurred, although key areas of disagreement remain.

Throughout the five-year history of the Defense and Space Talks the United States has had a consistent objective. We seek to facilitate a cooperative transition to a more stable deterrence which relies increasingly on nonnuclear defenses against strategic ballistic missiles, should they prove feasible. Today's strategic balance relies almost exclusively on nuclear offensive weapons. Advances in nonnuclear technologies now make it likely that greater reliance on advanced defenses can be combined with stabilizing reductions in strategic offenses to reduce further the risk of war.

To achieve these goals, the United States has a forward-looking approach in the Defense and Space Talks. We seek to assure full testing rights for advanced defensive technologies, as allowed in the 1972 Anti-Ballistic Missile, or ABM Treaty. We seek to free space-based ABM radars and their substitutes from outdated ABM Treaty limits. U.S. proposals would require serious and thorough discussions with the Soviet Union on specific measures for a cooperative transition prior to either Party's future deployment of advanced defenses beyond current ABM Treaty limits. U.S. proposals would also assure deployment rights after those talks. Finally, the United States seeks, through predictability—that is, confidence-building—measures, to avert future technological surprises by encouraging greater openness in both sides' activities in the field of strategic ballistic missile defense.

II

The centerpiece of the U.S. approach is our proposed Defense and Space Treaty, aimed at facilitating a cooperative transition. The U.S. draft, updated last December, retains key understandings reached at the 1987 Washington Summit and takes into account the outcome of the September 1989 Wyoming meeting of Secretary Baker and Foreign Minister Shevardnadze. At that session the Soviet Union dropped its demand for agreement on a period of nonwithdrawal from the ABM Treaty. The Soviet Union also dropped its linkage between signature and implementation of a START Treaty and reaching a new agreement on Defense and Space. The United States welcomed this step.

The U.S. draft Treaty provides for procedures whereby either Party may declare its intent to deploy strategic defenses by giving notice and proposing specific measures for implementing a cooperative transition. The Parties would be required to conduct three years of intensive discussions of the proposed specific measures and the implications for strategic stability. Subsequently, unless agreed otherwise, if a Party decided to commence deployments beyond those allowed by the ABM Treaty, it would have to give a further six months' notice.

This proposed mechanism offers a more stable path for deploying advanced defenses than the current alternative, which is to exercise the supreme interest withdrawal provision of the ABM Treaty. The ABM Treaty permits a Party to withdraw and deploy after only six months' notice. Our proposed new mechanism would help to ensure a meaningful and timely dialogue on how to achieve a stable, cooperative transition.

The revised U.S. draft Treaty also reflects the full rights of the Parties under the ABM Treaty to develop and test advanced space-based ABM systems and components. To build confidence and prevent misperceptions about such testing, the United States offered a Space Testing Assurance in October 1988. It assures the Soviet Union that U.S. space-based ABM testing which is permitted by the ABM Treaty could not constitute a prohibited deployment of defenses. The United States pledged that only from a limited number of ABM Test Satellites would it conduct testing of a component of an ABM system based on other physical principles and capable of substituting for an ABM interceptor missile. Such testing would be to counter a strategic ballistic missile or its elements in flight trajectory. The number of U.S. ABM Test Satellites in orbit simultaneously will not exceed a number well short of that associated with any realistic deployed capability. To build confidence further, the United States has proposed as a predictability measure notifications for launches, tests, changes of orbits, and deorbits of ABM Test Satellites.

The United States has also proposed that both sides be permitted to develop, test, or deploy space-based ABM radars and their substitutes without restriction. This would avoid future definitional and verification problems likely to arise because of advancing space-based technology, and it would encourage the evolution of stabilizing space-based sensors.

Another major concept in the U.S. draft Treaty is ensuring predictability in the development of the U.S.-Soviet strategic relationship in order to reduce the risk of nuclear war. This objective was agreed at the 1987 Washington Summit. In 1988 the United States proposed predictability measures to implement this objective. These measures include annual exchanges of programmatic data, meetings of experts, briefings, visits to laboratories, and observations of tests in the field of strategic ballistic missile defense. These measures would be carried out on a voluntary, reciprocal, and comparable basis. Their purpose is to create a better understanding of each side's ballistic missile defense activities as early as the research stage—years before the appearance of advanced defenses in the field.

At the Wyoming ministerial, Secretary of State Baker began an effort to see whether the areas of agreement on predictability measures could be expanded to become a point of mutual advantage. To stimulate our Soviet colleagues' understanding of the U.S. predictability measure for "visits to laboratories," Secretary Baker offered a first-hand, practical demonstration. He invited a group of Soviet experts to visit two U.S. laboratories conducting SDI research. The visit took place last December and was very successful. Ambassador Youri Nazarkin, who led the group, described the visit as a useful confidence-building measure. The Soviet experts received briefings, saw hardware first-hand, and had an opportunity to ask numerous questions of U.S. scientists conducting the research. The visit was designed both to foster transparency and to stimulate the negotiations on predictability measures. Subsequent to the visit, we were pleased when the Soviet Union accepted the concept of visits to laboratories as a predictability measure.

At the meeting between Secretary Baker and Foreign Minister Shevardnadze in Washington earlier this month, the United States proposed that the two sides agree on predictability measures in the form of a free-standing agreement—not linked to the ABM Treaty. The U.S. draft agreement calls on the Parties to implement the predictability measures outlined above.

To illustrate how such an agreement might work and to inform our negotiations, last month in Geneva the United States proposed reciprocal pilot implementation of the U.S. predictability measures for a single project on each side. The U.S. chose as its project the Infrared Background Signature Survey. We have asked the Soviet Union to select a Soviet project for pilot implementation. The U.S. idea is that the sides should conduct a "try-out" before implementing the free-standing predictability agreement. In this respect the initiative is similar to "try-outs" in other negotiations—the Joint Verification Experiment in the U.S.-Soviet Nuclear Testing Talks, the Verification and Stability Measures in the START negotiations, and the Bilateral Data Exchange and Verification Experiment in the U.S.-Soviet chemical weapons bilateral discussions.

There has been recent and important progress on predictability measures. The sides agree that they should expand and strengthen it. On the remaining issues in our negotiations, much remains to be done to achieve a Defense and Space Treaty that provides for greater stability in the years ahead as new technologies open the way for reducing the threat posed by ballistic missiles. Attaining this goal would contribute to greater security for the entire international community, and be the first cooperative transition in the history of U.S.-Soviet strategic relations.

III

Having spoken about our diplomatic efforts to achieve a cooperative transition to greater reliance on strategic ballistic missile defenses, I thought it would be useful to discuss briefly the U.S. commitment to such defenses and the contributions they could make. On February 7 at the Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory, President Bush stated, "In the 1990s, Strategic defense makes much more sense than ever before. * * *" He added later that day in San Francisco, "Let's be clear: This purely defensive concept doesn't threaten a single person anywhere in the world. God forbid, if it ever had to be used, it would be used against missiles, not against people."

The President's emphasis on the value of defenses is best understood in terms of how they can contribute to international security for the balance of this century and into the next. There are four main reasons why effective defenses can bring about a safer world.

First, preventing nuclear war must remain a fundamental goal. Survivable and effective strategic defenses would strengthen deterrence and reduce the risk of war by significantly complicating the planning and execution of a first strike with strategic offensive forces.

Second, as the United States and the Soviet Union reduce substantially their strategic offensive arms, advanced defenses can play a growing role in ensuring against the consequences of potential abrogation, breakout, and cheating in connection with such reductions.

Third, new threats are emerging against which effective nonnuclear defenses can provide substantial protection. As more countries develop ballistic missiles, along with chemical, biological, and nuclear weapons, threats to the international community will increase.

Fourth, effective defenses can provide protection against accidental or unauthorized launches of ballistic missiles. If such a catastrophic event were ever to occur, the value of defenses in human lives saved would be incalculable.

Taking into account these purposes and their relevance now, the United States is determined to preserve the option to develop and deploy effective, advanced defenses when they are ready, at a measured pace and in a cooperative way. This is our goal in the Defense and Space Talks.

IV

Mr. President, it has been an honor to appear before the Conference on Disarmament today. I wish you the best for the successful conclusion of the Spring Session, and I hope to have the opportunity to address this body again in the future.

Thank you.●

RETURN ALL HOSTAGES

● Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. President, Robert Polhill and Frank Reed are finally free after having spent a combined period of over 6 years in captivity in the Middle East. I think I speak for all my colleagues—indeed, all of America—in extending a warm and joyous "Welcome Home."

While the nightmarish ordeal is physically over for these men and their families, it is important to keep the remaining hostages in our thoughts and prayers. For them the pain an anguish continues. For them, the dawn of a new day is greeted behind the darkness of a blindfold and the silence of isolation. And their families deeply suffer, Mr. President, these men are husbands, fathers, sons, and brothers.

We must continue to work for the release of the remaining hostages. The goodwill and cooperation of Syria and Iran is vital to this end. America remembers: William Buckley, March 16, 1984; Terry Anderson, March 16, 1985; Thomas Sutherland, June 9, 1985; Joseph Cicippio, September 12, 1986; Edwin Tracy, October 21, 1986; Alann Steen, January 24, 1987; Jesse Turner, January 24, 1987; and William Higgins, February 18, 1988.

My colleagues will take note, Mr. President, that I make specific mention of William Buckley and Rich Higgins. These men were reportedly murdered by their captors, and continue to be held hostage—even in death. We must keep them foremost in mind in working for the return of all our hostages. Let us remember, the pain and suffering their families endure is eternal.●

COMMENDING THE SPIRIT OF VOLUNTARISM OF MONTICELLO, MN

● Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I rise today to recognize the efforts a small town in Minnesota is making to build a community playground. For the next 5 days, the good people of Monticello, MN, will unselfishly pool their talents, time, and resources to construct the exciting Pinewood community playground.

The result of this all-volunteer project will be a 15,000-square-foot wooden play structure. The project truly encompasses the entire community, no matter if the person is young or old, male or female, able bodied or disabled. The project encourages community involvement of all levels. People say that a project such as this is like the old-fashioned barn raisings that proliferated across the landscape of our great land, as symbols of cooperation and good will toward one's neighbor. I am encouraged that this spirit still exists.

Mr. President, one of the most important features of this playground is that it will be totally accessible to children with disabilities. Over 70 percent of the structure will be wheelchair accessible. The architect has constructed six such play structures across the country. The Pinewood community playground will be the most accessible play area in the Upper Midwest. Able bodied and disabled youths can now play side by side.

Mr. President, I am proud to represent in the Senate a community that so exemplifies the spirit of voluntarism. The Pinewood community playground is truly a "point of light." I hope that other communities in our great land will be inspired to follow the example set by the good people of Monticello, MN.●

TRIBUTE TO STATE REPRESENTATIVE FLOYD CLACK

● Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, I rise today to pay tribute to State Representative Floyd Clack, who represents the 80th District of Michigan, including a portion of Flint, my hometown.

Representative Clack's talents and dedication have already earned numerous awards and commendations from numerous groups including: the Michigan Education Association, the Metropolitan Chamber of Commerce, the Flint Urban League, the Flint NAACP, the Genessee County Action Agency, and the city of Flint. On May 7, 1990, the citizens of Flint and Genessee Counties will again honor Representative Clack with a special tribute in recognition of his contributions to the community and his achievements as a legislator.

Representative Clack holds a B.S. degree from Texas Southern University and a masters from Eastern Michigan University. Over the years, he has taught in the Houston public schools, the Federal Government Job Corps Center in Wisconsin, and has dedicated 16 years to the Flint Community School System where he taught law, African-American history, government, and consumer economics. Additionally, he has served as president and vice president of the Flint branch of the NAACP, and as president and vice president of the Flint City Council. In 1980, the people of the 80th District elected Floyd Clack to represent them in Michigan's House of Representatives.

Representative Clack's background and employment history display a consistent commitment to community service and also highlight the importance he places on education. These experiences and community involvements have allowed Representative Clack to know his community's needs on a personal and intimate level and have prevented him from becoming the type of legislator who operates from an ivory tower.

One example that comes to mind is Representative Clack's recent work to develop policies to address the social and economic problems confronting the African-American community. Statistics indicate that African-American males comprise 17 percent of the unemployed and 58 percent of the prison population but only 2 percent of the student population at State universities and 3 percent of public colleges enrollment. In response to these disturbing figures, Representative Clack sponsored a resolution which calls for the creation of a commission to study the problems faced by African-American males in Michigan and to make recommendations to the legislature on how to alleviate these problems. This commission would pay particular attention to issues of employment, education, health, and the criminal justice system. Along with recommending new legislative action, the commission would identify existing State, Federal, and local programs that address problems and solutions for the targeted population. This resolution recently passed the Michigan House of Representatives.

In recognition of these and other contributions, I am proud to join family, friends, and constituents in paying tribute to Michigan's State Representative Floyd Clack.●

THE YEAR OF THE AIRBORNE

● Mr. ROBB. Mr. President, the 82d Airborne Division has played a distinguished role in American military history since its founding at Fort Benning, GA, on June 1, 1940. In recognition of 50 years of patriotism and courage of the men of the airborne forces, including the distinguished senior Senator from South Carolina, Virginia's Governor, L. Douglas Wilder, has declared 1990 as "the Year of the Airborne" in Virginia.

Mr. President, I ask that the certificate of recognition signed by Governor Wilder on March 22 of this year be printed in the RECORD.

The certificate follows:

CERTIFICATE OF RECOGNITION

By virtue of the authority vested by the Constitution in the Governor of the Commonwealth of Virginia, there is hereby officially recognized "The Year of the Airborne."

Whereas, the Airborne Forces of the United States Army, composed of the most daring, intrepid, and courageous warriors in the world, was born June 1, 1940 at Fort

Benning, Georgia, by the formation of the original Parachute Test Platoon; and

Whereas, the Airborne Forces were composed of men who parachuted into enemy territory or were transported by gliders into conflict to do battle with the forces of aggression; and

Whereas, many of the original Airborne Forces were trained and developed in camps and training sites in the Commonwealth of Virginia; and

Whereas, Virginians volunteered for the Airborne Forces and these veterans still observe their airborne traditions through their organizations and the many active Airborne Units in Virginia; and

Whereas, men from the Commonwealth in the prime of their life, voluntarily served in the Airborne Forces with pride and gallantry; and

Whereas, to honor 50 years of continuous performance of the Airborne Forces of the United States and to recognize their perseverance, patriotism, and selfless dedication to the ideals of freedom;

Now, therefore, I, Lawrence Douglas Wilder, Governor, do hereby recognize 1990 as "the Year of the Airborne" in Virginia and call its significance to the attention of all our citizens.●

SOUTHERN ILLINOIS SETS THE PACE IN TREE PLANTING

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues an environmental project in and around Carbondale, IL, that offers a good example to other communities.

For the second year in a row, the Southern Illinoisan newspaper and a dedicated corps of volunteers have distributed, free of charge, thousands of young trees for planting throughout the area. This year, distribution sites were set up in 10 communities to distribute 20,000 trees. Hundreds of people showed up and all the trees were distributed, most of them inside of an hour. The project was so successful that the newspaper has tripled the scope of its project, and another 40,000 trees will be given away May 5.

Carbondale, with a population of about 30,000, is one of the Nation's most livable cities. It has received the All-America City Award, and there's always been a strong sense of community spirit and community pride in Carbondale and nearby communities. So let us put this tree-planting project in perspective. In a similar effort, the city of Houston recently gave away 15,000 trees and the city of Dallas gave away 5,000 trees. Some may think things are bigger in Texas. Not in this case. When it comes to tree planting, things are bigger in southern Illinois.

There are many reasons, in both practical and symbolic terms, why large-scale tree-planting projects like this warrant attention and emulation.

As we all know, trees—even entire forests—are being cut down worldwide at a much faster rate than they are being replaced. Southern Illinoisans have particular appreciation for the importance of trees and forests. We are home to the Shawnee National Forest, one of our State's great natural assets and attractions. We know that forests are part of our heritage that we want to pass to future generations.

Trees produce much of the oxygen we breathe. Trees also significantly reduce the levels of carbon dioxide and other air pollutants. In urban settings, trees also perform conservation and cost-saving roles. Trees can cut home energy costs by 10 to 50 percent. And trees stabilize the soil, conserving both water and topsoil, two or our Nation's most valuable resources.

Tree planting has brought stunning changes to the natural character of man-made environments. The annual cherry blossom ritual in the Nation's Capital is an example.

The Simon family lives near Carbondale, in the village of Makanda. We have a family custom of planting a tree each election day. That way we always know that, whatever the election result, something good, something tangable, something constructive, something lasting, will emerge from that day. There's a special satisfaction afterward in watching those trees grow and blossom and become part and parcel of the southern Illinois soil. "I planted that," I say to myself. I'm sure those same feelings will be shared by the thousands of families in southern Illinois who have planted trees this year. Those trees will provide that some kind of satisfaction for years to come.

As I talk with people in town meetings, I have the sense that many yearn to find out more about what they can do, as families and as individuals, to make a difference in improving the environment. That depth of feeling is new. The Southern Illinoisan tree planting project has provided one answer, and it's being met with enormous enthusiasm. It seems to me that an annual custom is being born in southern Illinois. I hope so.

Earth Day was an idea born in the United States, but that day and what it stands for has become an overarching cause that not only unites all Americans but all the people of the world. Citizens of 141 nations participated in Earth Day activities like tree planting.

We are proud of southern Illinois' ambitious venture into tree planting, and we hope it will be an example to other communities. You don't have to be a sprawling metropolis to make a difference for the environment.

The spirit of Earth Day will live on in southern Illinois in part through the thousands of new trees that will take root this year, further gracing one of Illinois' most beautiful regions and improving the quality of life in a variety of ways for thousands of families.●

HUMAN RIGHTS IN YUGOSLAVIA

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, on April 24, the Congressional Human Rights Caucus held a hearing focusing on human rights in Yugoslavia. I was pleased to participate in that hearing and to offer my support to those fighting for human rights in that country, particularly Mr. Dobroslav Paraga.

In testimony presented at the hearing, Mr. Paraga asserted that "Yugoslavia, without pause, continues to trample fundamental human rights and freedoms as they are drawn in the Helsinki Accords and the Universal Declarations of the Rights of Man."

More than 8 months ago, the Senate unanimously adopted Senate Resolution 169, which I submitted, calling for greater respect for human rights in Yugoslavia and commending the work of Mr. Paraga. Congressman WILLIAM BROOMFIELD then submitted identical legislation, House Resolution 240, in the House.

Mr. President, the negative reaction of not only the Yugoslav Government, but, even more disturbing, of our own State Department, to these resolutions, has raised serious questions about the commitment of our Government to supporting respect for fundamental human rights around the globe.

The Congress must resist efforts by the administration to shift the burden of guilt away from the offending government and onto individuals, such as Mr. Paraga, who are simply seeking to practice, and to guarantee for others, fundamental human rights.

Mr. President, last week's Human Rights Caucus hearing made a vital contribution to that effort. I congratulate the caucus chairmen, Congressman TOM LANTOS and Congressman JOHN PORTER, and all members of the caucus for their fine work, and I ask that the text of Mr. Paraga's testimony be printed in full at this point in the RECORD.

The testimony follows:

Dear Members of the Congressional Human Rights Caucus and Members of the Senate:

I, Croatian activist for Human Rights, along with my friends and associates, struggle for a small piece of the freedom and democracy that your citizens in the United States of America enjoy every day.

In many parts of the Yugoslavian Federal country the state of human rights is akin to being in the middle ages, Ethnic Albanians in the south are even more oppressed than Croatians are in the north. Albanians constitute 10 percent of the total population of Yugoslavia, yet they bear as much as 80 percent of the total number of political prisoners.

On the eve of this hearing the Yugoslavian administration fearing this gathering in the U.S. Congress has put a halt to its incredible actions in the Kosovo region, but countless victims and political prisoners remain. One of these Juraj Pilko has just written on his treatment from his jail cell in Stara Gradiska where he is enduring 6 years of incarceration for sending 6 letters to foreign destinations.

Following S. Res. 169, dated August 4th 1989, and sponsored by Michigan Senator Donald Riegle, the first ever resolution related to Yugoslavia and condemning the trampling of human rights in Yugolslavia, their administration promised to implement a multi-party system which has still not been carried out in 4 out of a total of 6 republics.

Upon Rep. William Broomfield's introduction in Congress of H. Res. 240 for protection of human rights in my country, and during which time he simultaneously sent home visiting Yugoslavian Prime Minister Markovic, who was looking for a handout, emply-handed, the Yugoslavian Secretary of State requested in the Croatian Assembly complete amnesty for political prisoners, a request which not only has been set aside but, in direct contradiction to it, the number of political prisoners rose significantly.

Last week just prior to the very beginning of this hearing, the Yugoslavian administration reached a decision to pardon 108 political prisoners. Among those pardoned is the well-known Albanian writer Adem Demaqi who has spent a total of 29 years incarcerated for the sole reason of having founded one of that regime's impermissible opposition parties. Demaqi was in fact released from prison two days ago into what amounts to be house arrest, as evidenced by the presence of the special forces of the police and the dispersal of the throngs of well-wishers welcoming him home by threats of open fire upon them if they didn't disperse within 20 minutes.

In the meantime thousands of others, not as well-known as Demaqi, remained incarcerated. Likewise in 1977 prior to the conference on European Security and Collaboration in Belgrade, the authorities announced the pardon of 763 political prisoners, of which in reality 26 were released. Among those released was the well-known dissident Mihajlo Mihajlov, who is present here among us today.

In Yugoslavia, moreover, the political police responsible for persecuting millions of the population, for physically liquidating its political opponents, and who perpetuate this reign of terror, have never been disbanded. The secret police is, to this day, the instrument of repression because of its protection of the Communist party and its monopoly on power.

The pinnacle of this kind of manipulative reign is represented by their choice for the President of the Electoral Commission for the first multi-party elections in Croatia in 51 years, which were held 2 days ago. Mr. Milko Gajski, President of the Electoral Commission and now also president of the Supreme Court of Croatia, is directly responsible for my maltreatment in the investigative jail in Zagreb. He is responsible for the torture and death of my friend Ernest Brajder in the same jail, for the hundreds and hundreds of rigged political processes as well as electric shock treatment tortures. He had been the president of the District Court for 20 years in which this jail and torture chamber are located. Just because of this unacceptable fact the conducted multi-party elections in Croatia could not have been orderly or legitimate.

Recently, in Zagreb, I was personally elected by secret ballot, and coincidentally without my presence, into the innermost leadership of one of the newly created political parties in Croatia. Meanwhile according to the regulations governing the organization of parties, I am prohibited from assuming my duties because I presently am under a political sentence, exiled from Croatia to neighboring Slovenia.

Even though the presidents of the Human Rights Caucus, Rep. Tom Lantos and Rep. John Porter on October 26, 1989 wrote the president of the Federal Yugoslavian government, A. Markovic, to ensure respect for human rights and to allow for the investigation of the mysterious death of Ernest Brajder who died in custody in 1980, Markovic, to this day, has not done this, and, furthermore against myself he has not set aside the court sentence of jail and prohibition of public appearances. But then Markovic during his visit to Washington, when addressing members of the Foreign Affairs Committee, declined any kind of guarantees for my undisturbed return to my homeland.

This past month I sent to the address of everyone of the approximately 190 members of this respected caucus photographs and names of the innocent Yugoslavian citizens killed in February of this year, whose only crime was to be on the streets demanding the establishment of a multi-party system and free elections.

Yugoslavia has not at all resolved its problems of respecting basic human rights nor its problem of respecting the equality and national sovereignty of the small nations which, whether they wanted to or didn't want to, reside within her. By this behavior Yugoslavia, without pause, continues to trample fundamental human rights and freedoms as they are drawn in the Helsinki Accords and universal declarations of the rights of man.

While in my country I am forbidden to speak, sentenced to silence. Here in the American Human Rights Caucus and your Senate, you have made it possible for me to speak openly and publicly, welcoming me and all people who dream of freedom and justice in the jails of Yugoslavia. The Human Rights Caucus and the Senate of the United States of America are magnificent examples of how the American nations defends the freedom of the small nameless man as well as the freedom of enslaved nations.

H. Res. 240, introduced by Rep. William Broomfield, is necessary and indispensable because the governing body of Yugoslavia only comprehends this kind of language and also because Yugoslavia, as opposed to the Soviet Union, is completely dependent for its survival upon the economic aid of the United States and the West.

Some members of Congress and some of the administration of the State Department oppose this resolution and unintentionally prolong the continuation of dictatorship in Yugoslavia. From this spot I invite them to a higher understanding to help H. Res. 240 through the election because the path to freedom and justice cannot be stopped by anyone.

Therefore, I am hopeful in the name of all those oppressed and thirsty for respect and human rights that H. Res. 240 will be adopted by you on the floor and that the opposition against it will cease in the subcommittee for Europe and the Middle East.

I would aslo like to express my deepest respect and gratitude to the Human Rights Caucus, particularly to Tom Lantos, William Broomfield, John Porter and William Lipinski and to the Senate of the United States of America, particularly Donald Riegle, Carl Levin, Paul Simon, Alan Dixon, Jesse Helms, John Chafee, and Edward Kennedy for this day today and for all that you have done and are doing for freedom and the defense of the persecuted and humiliated in my homeland and the whole world. Thank you, God Bless America.—Dobroslav Paraga.●

VOTERS PROPOSE TO PUT A LID ON THEIR REPRESENTATIVES

● Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I would like to share an article from the Sunday New York Times of April 29, 1990, entitled "Voters Propose To Put a Lid on Their Representatives." The article provides a comprehensive report on the term limitation movement to date.

Term limitation is exactly that—a movement. Most legislators will not act except to oppose it, in spite of the fact that Gallup has reported a 70 percent public approval of the idea. Therefore, the public is beginning to take matters into its own hands. The article points out that a number of grassroots groups are marshalling the strong public support for limitation of State and Federal legislators.

The article further cites that State legislators in 16 States will act on resolutions petitioning Congress to adopt a term limitation constitutional amendment. In over 20 States such resolutions have been introduced or requested for introduction.

The air in Congress has grown stale with careerism. Members have manipulated the system to guarantee the seats they occupy. Mr. President, it is time for a fresh breeze to blow the cobwebs out of Congress. It is time for term limitation.

I ask that the article "Voters Propose To Put a Lid on Their Representatives" be inserted into the RECORD immediately following my remarks.

The article follows:

VOTERS PROPOSE TO PUT A LID ON THEIR REPRESENTATIVES

(By Robert Reinhold)

LOS ANGELES.—Yet another trend is swelling up from California, and this one is unlikely to make lawmakers anywhere very happy. Since it has become almost impossible to throw the rascals out, a movement is gathering steam in California and elsewhere to shut them out—by limiting the time any legislator can hold the same office.

The issue is showing the same popular appeal as the grass-roots tax revolt of a dozen years ago that swept east from California. Signatures are being gathered now to put two initiatives on the November ballot to limit terms in the state legislature, and they are finding support in both conservative and liberal quarters. Similar efforts are under way in Colorado and Oklahoma, where voters can also make law directly by ballot. Meanwhile, three national groups are pushing for a constitutional amendment to limit members of Congress to 12 years.

Numerous steps have been taken at all levels of government in recent years to impose-limits on outside income, revamp campaign financing and otherwise police legislators. But limiting the number of terms represents the starkest approach. "Most other remedies are moderate and perhaps palliative," said Alan Rosenthal, director of the Eagleton Institute of Politics at Rutgers University. "But limiting terms gets right to the core of the system. People want to stay in. They like it."

Twenty-nine states limit the terms of their governors and other top officeholders, and Virginia and Kentucky allow only one term for statewide elected office. But no state imposes any limit on legislators.

Legislators do tend to stay. The average tenure in the California Senate is 17 years. In New York, Senate terms average 11 to 12 years. Assembly terms 8 to 9.

In Washington, too, incumbency is its own reward; in the United States House of Representatives, 98.5 percent of incumbents who ran in 1988 were re-elected, as were 86 percent in the Senate.

Critics say this has produced a class of career officeholders who have cloaked themselves with formidable advantages of incumbency, lost touch with the people they serve and, in some cases, sunk into cynical corruption. The California Legislature is all but paralyzed in dealing with the state's problems and is mired in a vote-selling scandal. Julian Palmer, executive director of New York State Common Cause asserts that in New York more incumbents have been indicted than lost re-election in recent years.

"The good people of this state are saying we have had enough," said John Vernon of Operation New Broom, which is gathering signatures for one of the California initiatives, the conservative-backed Political Reform Act of 1990. It would limit state senators to two four-year terms and Assembly members to three two-year terms. "We are tired of having no access to decision-making in Sacramento," Mr. Vernon said. "This would be a citizen-legislator who serves a few terms and then goes back to live in his community. I would change the dynamics of the political process."

Polls suggest that despite their habit of re-electing officials, people would like the system to change. A New York Times/CBS News Poll released this month found that limits on Congressional terms were favored by 61 percent of the respondents—Democrats and Republicans, liberals and conservatives, whites and blacks, men and women alike. Polls in California asking about the state legislature have produced even larger margins.

The two initiatives circulating in California differ in significiant ways. One comes from Attorney General John K. Van de Kamp, who has made his "Clean Government Act" initiative a keystone of his campaign for the Democratic gubernatorial nomination. Among other things, it would limit legislators to twelve consecutive years—senators to three terms and Assembly members to six—and the Governor to two terms, or eight years.

The other proposal, from the conservative National Tax Limitation Committee, would impose much tighter limits. Its backers say the Van de Kamp measure is weak because it would start the 12-year clock this year, meaning that no incumbent would be forced out before the year 2002.

In Oklahoma, a group called Oklahomans for Legislative Reform hopes to put a measure on the ballot in August to limit legislators to 12 cumulative years. In Colorado, where the state Senate in February rejected term limits, Coloradans Back in Charge is circulating petitions to put a voter initiative on the November ballot limiting service to two consecutive terms.

Nationally, Americans to Limit Congressional Terms has begun a campaign for a constitutional amendment to limit Senators to two consecutive terms and representatives to six. The legislatures in South Dakota and Utah passed resolutions calling for such an amendment, and 16 other states are expected to consider it this year.

All of this makes the average political scientist and even many in Common Cause a little uneasy. Prof. Alvin D. Sokolow, an expert on California government at the University of California, Davis, argues that term limits are an "artificial device, overkill" that would deprive the public of able senior officials. Professor Sokolow, like Mr. Palmer of New York Common Cause, said the better approach is to tighten campaign spending limits, prevent incumbents from redrawing their districts after the census and scale back free mailing privileges, all of which would give newcomers a better shot.

Not unexpectedly the ballot proposals are unpopular in Sacramento. John Vasconcellos, a Democratic Assemblyman from San Jose and Chairman of the select committee on ethics, calls them "simple-minded." Mr. Vasconcellos, who has been in office for 24 years, has said, "I don't have to dump my dentist or my doctor or my car mechanic just because they've been around too long."●

COMPUTER SOFTWARE RENTAL AMENDMENTS ACT OF 1989

● Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, as an original cosponsor of S. 198, the Computer Software Rental Amendments Act of 1989, I am pleased that this legislation passed the Senate. I strongly support it. The computer software industry is an important and dynamic one in this country, and it is incumbent on Congress to create a legal environment under which it can continue to flourish and sustain a world leadership position.

I would like to specifically address one area of concern, however, with regard to the exclusion of video games from the protection of this legislation. Video games are computer software which can be offered to the consumer in either discs or cartridges. The same effort goes into the development of the software, and the capital costs and the risks are the same. Under this bill, identical copyrighted games can be rented if they are in the cartridge format, and cannot without the copyright owner's approval if they are in the disc format. I think that both formats should be treated the same.

For example, Nintendo cartridges are available in almost every video rental store in America. Software for Nintendo is developed not only by the company itself, but also by many small independent companies who are licensees of Nintendo. As is the nature of computer game development, many of these licensees are small startups who risk their entire future on the development of video games. If they don't sell, these firms don't stay in business. Of course, Nintendo, itself, can spend millions before developing a video game that people like.

Clearly, sales of video cartridges are reduced by the practice of video rental outlets offering game cartridges. A single cartridge can be rented hundreds of times. I don't have a problem with consumers being able to rent these game cartridges, however, the copyright owner should at least receive some commercial benefit from the rental. Currently, the copyright owner receives no return whatsoever from these rentals, except from the original sale. I have heard from these developers who believe they should be afforded the same protection with regard to rental as other software developers, and I agree.

I understand that there would be no difference in treatment for video game cartridges if there were more of the cartridge copying technology in America that is now rampant abroad. Well, copying technology is already being demonstrated at U.S. trade shows, and some Senators have seen similar demonstrations of these cartridge copying machines. Cartridges are copied all over the Far East with this technology. It is not fully logical to me that we do not now address an inevitable problem.

As this bill stands as passed by the Senate, it looks like Congress is penalizing companies, like Nintendo, which have developed technology that makes it more difficult to illegally copy their product. Simply put, Nintendo successfully created a security system for its product, while software developers who utilize the disc format have been substantially unsuccessful. My preference would be to protect the intellectual property of all software producers, whether enclosing their technology in disc or cartridge.

Nintendo has suggested that a fair compromise in S. 198 would be a delay in rental of game cartridges for 1 year. This is an eminently reasonable position. In fact, this concept exists with regard to the motion picture industry; consumers cannot rent movies at video stores for a period of time after they are released, giving motion picture studios a chance to receive a return on their investment through theater showings and the sale of broadcast and cable rights.

The committee report notes that it will "carefully monitor developments in this industry to determine if modifications in the act are appropriate" with regard to video games. I am quite sure that in the near future we will look back with a sorrow that we didn't exercise the slightest bit of foresight to include computer data in cartridges under the Computer Software Rental Amendments Act. I only hope that the industry survives the loss of development costs while we take a wait and see approach.●

REFORMULATED GASOLINE

● Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. President, as the Clean Air Act debate shifts to the House of Representatives, I would like to take this opportunity to share with my colleagues some interesting information that recently has been made available on gasoline quality and, in particular, the need to reformulate gasoline.

I first would like to ask that the text of an April 13, 1990, article from the Washington Post entitled, "The Gassing of America," be inserted into the RECORD. The article, written by Francesca Lyman, gives an excellent analysis of the problem of increasing gasoline toxicity. In that article, Ms. Lyman documents the serious environmental and health effects caused by petroleum fuel and discusses how efforts to change the composition of gasoline can mitigate these effects while improving motor vehicle performance.

The second piece of information that I would like to share with my colleagues is an article from the trade publication Oxy-Fuel News, which I ask be printed in the RECORD. The article reports on the recent 26th automotive/petroleum forum in Dearborn, MI. Of particular interest are remarks made by Mr. Joseph M. Colucci, director of the Fuels and Lubricants Research Division of General Motors Corp. In his address to the forum, Mr. Colucci put foward what the Nation's largest automaker considers to be the optimal specifications for a reformulated gasoline. Two of these specifications bear special note: A 25 volume percent cap on aromatics, with no more than 0.8 percent benzene, and an oxygen content of at least, and I stress at least, 2.5 weight percent oxygen.

At this time, our colleagues in the House of Representatives are being subjected to a ferocious lobbying campaign against reformulated gasoline being orchestrated by the oil industry. Central to that campaign is a well-defined sense of that industry's self-interest and an attendant refusal to acknowledge the increased toxiciy of gasoline and the human health threat it has wrought. The information I offer today will help set the record straight.

The articles follow:

ENVIRONMENT: THE GASSING OF AMERICA

(By Francesca Lyman)

Driving a car, to judge from the fantasies presented in television commercials, takes us closer to a state of nature than a trip to a misty mountain peak or a deserted stretch of canyon. Yet the driving privilege, more often than not, can be a far from nontoxic experience, offering us a seat on a congested stretch of freeway or a place on line at the self-serve pump.

Just how toxic cars really are is beginning to emerge from the smoke left behind the last round of debates on the Clean Air Act. New studies portray automobile emissions as playing a bigger role in toxic air pollution and cancer than was earlier thought.

Most people, when they think of toxic chemicals, imagine them spewing out of plants and factories," says Dick Wilson, who heads the Environmental Protection Agency's (EPA) mobile source pollution division. "But it turns out that over half of the cancer incidence is caused by air pollution coming from cars." An analysis by EPA of toxic air pollution reveals that motor vehicles contribute more than 56 percent of the cancer incidence due to toxic chemicals.

Besides adding toxic chemicals to the atmosphere, petroleum fuel contributes more than half the carbon monoxide that pollutes the air (a source of heart problems, among other illnesses), a third of the nitrous oxides and a quarter of the hydrocarbons (both of which form smog and lead to respiratory illnesses), and nearly a third of the carbon dioxide (a leading contributor to global warming).

Just this week, the traffic congestion around the District was named as the possible culprit in an incident involving students who became ill. The group was on its way back to Kentucky when several students had to be treated at a Virginia hospital for weakness, shortness of breath and nausea. They were found to have elevated levels of carbon monoxide in their blood.

New-car technology has greatly cleaned up tailpipe emissions during the last 20 years, but fuels have gotten dirtier. "Cars with catalytic converters are 99 percent cleaner than in 1970," says Counselor to the President C. Boyden Gray, a major supporter of alternative fuels as a clean-air strategy. "But gasoline is far dirtier than in 1970. It doesn't have lead but it is dirtier for aromatics."

Most unleaded gasoline made today contains as much as 35 percent aromatic hydrocarbon compounds, including such hazardous chemicals as benzene, toluene, and xylene (known in the trade as "BTX"). Benzene, a component of crude oil and a product of the refining process, is a known carcinogen. Toluene and xylene mix during combustion to form more benzene.

While most people think of unleaded gasoline as an environmentally more benign fuel, it actually is a mixed blessing. Unleaded gas contains no lead, thus eliminating the hazards of neurotoxic illnesses and brain damage, especially for children. But the major oil companies have replaced lead with octane enhancers potentially far worse. So, says David Lindahl, director of the Department of Energy's alcohol fuels program, we may have traded "less mental retardation for more cancers."

America's thirst for high-octane gas has spurred more and more BTX being added to fuel blends, especially premium blends. Because the government failed to regulate BTX emissions after it forced oil companies to phase out lead emissions, Big Oil invested heavily in technology that would replace the octane loss with increased BTX in the nation's gasoline pool.

Since the lead phase-down more than 10 years ago, aromatic hydrocarbons in gasoline have increased dramatically. According to statistics from HyOx, Inc., a Fallbrook, Calif., independent consulting firm that specializes in analyzing oil refinery operations and composition of fuel, aromatics in the U.S. gasoline pool have gone up from an average of 22 percent of gasoline content in the late 1970s to an average of 33 percent in 1990. Some premium, high-octane blends have been found to contain more than 50 percent aromatic hydrocarbons.

When these aromatic chemicals are burned in car engines, they not only emit carcinogens and toxics into the air but highly volatile, photo-reactive chemicals that contribute to urban smog as well. According to statistics prepared by Safer Air Through Fuel Enhancement and Reformulation ("SAFER"), an ad hoc group composed of alternative fuel supporters, farm groups and environmentalists, gasoline with a 35 percent aromatic content produces 35 percent more carbon monoxide, 10 percent more unburned hydrocarbons and 25 percent more nitrogen oxides, all of which are considered major pollutants in urban area. Gasoline with that level of aromatics, for example, also producers 25 percent more benzene. The cleaner alternative SAFER supports is fuels such as methanol, ethanol and natural gas, which contain less aromatic compounds when burned, and reformulated gasoline blends, so-called "oxygenates," which, by raising gasoline's oxygen content, promote more thorough combustion of fuel, reducing pollution and at the same time raising octane.

Of the five most serious toxic chemicals in the air—benzene, chromium, 1,3 butadiene, formaldehyde and particulate organic matter—most can be traced to the current contents of gasoline, the EPA has found. Of the total benzene found in the atmosphere, for example, 85 percent comes from gasoline; of the 1,3 butadiene found in the air, 98 percent comes from gasoline.

How dangerous are these chemicals? Relatively low exposures to benzene (in the parts per million range) have been associated by epidemiologists with greater risk of leukemia, a blood cancer. And some scientists, such as Samuel Epstein, a professor of occupational and environmental medicine at the University of Illinois, have suggested that no exposure level may be safe: "It is the overwhelming consensus of the independent scientific community that there is no way of setting safe exposure levels or tolerances to any chemical agent such as benzene that can induce genetic damage or cancer," Epstein wrote recently.

So bad is benzene that a California South Coast study concluded that it was the highest-risk carcinogen with which Californians routinely come in contact. According to EPA, environmental sources of benzene have been found to result in 200 added cancer cases each year in the Los Angeles basin alone.

The South Coast Air Quality Management District found that California commuters traveling an average of 1½ hours per day are exposed to about four times as much benzene inside their cars as in the average Southern California air outside their cars as in the average Southern California air outside their cars. According to the EPA's own study, one's risk of exposure to benzene is 14 times greater in large cities than in rural areas.

What are one's risks of exposure in simple car refueling, when benzene and other chemical vapors escape from the pump? "When people are pumping gasoline themselves, they could be exposed to peak levels of 5 to 6 parts per million of benzene," says Peter Infante, an epidemiologist at the Occupatonal Safety and Health Administration (OSHA). There are no levels of exposure set for "mobile sources," and thus ordinary motorists (including gas-station attendants) aren't protected. But, according to Infante, 5 parts per million in any 15-minute period is the maximum "stationary source" exposure limit set for workers in chemical plants. Workers aren't to be exposed to above 1 part per million as an average over an eight-hour day.

Gasoline-station attendants do get warnings on the gasoline they handle, as required by OSHA, although motorists don't find such warnings posted on gas pumps. Chevron's warning, for example, reads: "This product may contain up to 4.9 percent benzene. Repeated or prolonged breathing of benzene vapors has been associated with the development of chromosomal damage in experimental animals and various blood diseases in humans ranging from aplastic anemia to leukemia. All of these diseases can be fatal."

Given the high risks of these chemicals, some critics charge that the oil companies have been irresponsible and that the EPA has been derelict in controlling Big Oil's increasing use of these hazardous aromatics.

"Major oil companies have artificially stimulated demand for high-octane gasoline through high-intensity advertising as a way to increase profits," charges the District-based group Citizen Action, in its November 1989 report, "Cancer at the Pump." Ranking major oil companies by their capacity for producing aromatic chemicals both in the refining process known as "catalytic reforming" and also to some extent in the "catalytic cracking" process, Citizen Action named a "Toxic 10": Exxon, Chevron, Amoco, Shell, Mobil, BP America, Star Enterprises, Atlantic Richfield (ARCO) Sun and USX (Marathon). It should be noted that Sun, ARCO and Marathon have developed reformulated fuels that reduce toxic pollutants. The group blasted these oil companies for deceptive advertising that makes consumers believe "premium" and "high-octane" blends are really better for their cars.

Fuel experts say that a higher-octane fuel isn't necessarily better for the ordinary car—and it may even be worse. The American Petroleum Institute, the oil industry's main trade association, wrote that "in most vehicles, no benefit is gained from using gasoline that has a higher octane number than is needed to prevent knock."

Aromatic hydrocarbons, on the other hand, can foul car engines, bring down fuel efficiency and change the compression ratio in the engine so that a car demands increasingly higher octane fuel to prevent knocking. Volvo Corp., among others, urges its new customers not to buy premium fuel because it has a tendency to clog the fuel injectors. "Most people have been brainwashed by the oil companies to buy high octane fuel," says a Department of Energy official. "They see the tiger jumping off the rock and their natural assumption is that it's better for the performance of their car."

Buying high-octane gas can be as much as 40 percent more expensive than regular yet consumers are getting less mileage per gallon, since more of its content is taken up by octane enhancers. Edwin Rothschild of Citizen Action estimates that consumers are spending more than $1 billion a year more than they should on useless octane. According to Bill Holmberg of SAFER, "a review of the owner's manuals and discussion with experts in the field tell me that no more than 10 percent of the cars on the road require a high-octane gasoline (91-93 octane)." Yet, he points out, more than 33 percent of the gasoline sold is premium fuel. One government official calls this "the greatest rip-off of all time."

Given the manifold problems with toxic chemicals in gasoline, what should the government be doing to protect consumers? Sen. Tom Daschle (D-S.D.) has for the last year prodded the EPA to set standards for aromatic chemicals, writing in a letter to EPA chief William Reilly that he should inaugurate a national strategy to steer the nation's petroleum refiners away from so-called "severe reforming" of crude oil to achieve higher octane and "move to achieve significant reductions in lethal benzene emissions." Citizen Action has asked the Federal Trade Commission to stop what it considers the oil companies' misleading advertising of premium fuels, with no success. And independent ethanol producers filed an antitrust action against most of the big oil companies alleging that the companies conspired to restrain trade (by cornering the market on refining processes to produce higher-octane blends.)

Until now, says Whit Fosburgh of Daschle's office, "the oil companies have gotten a free ride on the Clean Air Act." But all that could change in the future if the new clean air bill passes with strong provisions to encourage reformulated gas, which would significantly reduce aromatic chemicals.

The Senate version of the clean air bill, which passed earlier this month, contains a controversial amendment that is opposed by the oil industry as being too costly. It mandates the sale of cleaner fuels in nine ozone nonattainment areas and also sets ceilings on aromatic chemicals in gasoline, steadily reducing them to a maximum of 30 percent in 1992, 28 percent in 1994 and 25 percent in 1996. With 111 billion gallons of gasoline used to power vehicles throughout the United States each year, this bill would reduce emissions of hazardous chemicals in 26 billion gallons of gasoline. The House is now considering similar amendments.

The use of cleaner, reformulated gasoline—using such alternative octane enhancers as ethanol, methyl tertiary-butyl ether (MTBE) and ethyl tertiary butyl ether (ETBE)—could reduce chemicals in the environment, but since benzene and other chemicals are formed in the gasoline combustion process, there is almost no way to completely remove aromatic chemicals from the air as long as gasoline is used.

An easier way to be rid of aromatic chemicals, as well as many of the other car-related pollutants, suggests White House counsel Gray, could be switching to non-petroleum fuels altogether.

Moving to cleaner alternative fuels—such as methanol, ethanol and compressed natural gas—could pave the way for far greater toxic air pollution reductions in the future. Compressed natural gas, for example, used in about 500,000 vehicles worldwide, is 80 percent cleaner for volatile organic compounds, up to 30 percent cleaner for carbon dioxide, and 100 percent free of aromatics.

"Ultimately we may find it cheaper to convert fuel systems than to take out the aromatics," says Gray.

For now, however, when drivers pull up to the pump they have no nontoxic alternative to "unleaded."

WHAT YOU CAN DO

If you're like most people, you tank up about twice a week and you probably try to save money by pumping the gasoline yourself. You may use premium gas, believing it to be better for your car. But if you're not cautious you may be exposing yourself to potentially hazardous levels of chemicals.

Don't breathe in the fumes if you can help it. "You don't want to be exposed to benzene," says Peter Infante of the Occupational Safety and Health Administration. "If you're going to pump your own gas, stand upwind from it."

Infante also makes these recommendations:

Keep your windows rolled up to prevent fumes from forming pockets in the car. Be especially careful around young children.

Try to keep it off your skin. If any spills on you, wash it off.

Choose stations that have vapor recovery systems on the pumps. They can reduce the fumes by up to 90 percent.

Ed Rothschild of Citizen Action recommends that people support the government in encouraging alternative fuels and gasoline reformulation to reduce chemical emissions. Also, he says, by the level of octane your car needs. Unless your engine knocks there's no reason to use a higher-octane gasoline, says Rothschild.

AUTO/OIL INDUSTRIES OFFER ADVICE FOR AN ENVIRONMENTAL DECADE

GM OFFICIAL SAYS REFORMULATED FUEL SHOULD CONTAIN AT LEAST 2.5% (WT.) OXYGEN

Oil companies have plenty of advice for automobile manufacturers and vice versa, judging from comments made by a pair of speakers featured last Wednesday at the 26th Automobile/Petroleum Industry Forum in Dearborn, MI.

Reducing the market demand for premium gasoline, for example, is one step refiners could take to avoid an "octane crunch," according to Joseph M. Colucci, head of fuels and lubricants for General Motors.

Controlling aromatics should not be the result of reducing consumption of premium gasoline, according to Bert C. Striegler, retired manager of technical services for Conoco, Inc.

Oil companies do not set premium gasoline demand, said Striegler. "The truth is, the consumer does." he said. "If the consumer bought less than something like 10% premium gasoline [of all gasoline sales] we probably—because of this infrastructure—would quit making this stuff, much as we quit making leaded gasoline." The average consumer knows little about gasoline, Striegler added, "but he does know when his engine knocks."

Colucci said that General Motors would recommend the use of sub-octane gasoline if the fuel's detergency and other properties were the same.

In addition to reducing the demand for premium gasoline, Colucci suggested greater use of the following blendstocks and additives to avert an octane crunch: alkylate, oxygenates and additives that reduce octane requirement increase (ORI).

On the subject of oxygenates, Striegler said, "We're not sure we fully understand the need for oxygenates—There's a terrific mix here of science and politics."

Colucci presented a list of suggested properties of reformulated gasoline, which included a 2.5% (wt.) minimum oxygen content. "Oxygenates help reduce carbon monoxide emissions, especially from older vehicles, and they are excellent octane improvers," Colucci said, adding that ethers are preferred over alcohols on the basis of volatility and other reasons. Olefins should be capped at 5% (vol.) initially to help reduce the reactivity of emissions and reduce deposits, he added.

Colucci urged oil companies to provide uniform dosages of detergents in all grades. "Some companies treat premium with better additives than their other grades of gasoline. Deposit control is an environmental issue," Colucci said. "The public should not be forced to purchase premium gasoline and waste octane just to get a supplier's best deposit-control additive treatment."

Striegler, on the other hand, said, "If you converted every gallon of gasoline to deposit intake additive control, the consumer would face about $1.5 million more in daily costs," noting that "the customer continues to drive to the cheapest pump."

"If you need to have aromatics reduced, then we should focus on the real problem, which is aromatics level—not the octane level," Striegler said. Refiners, he continued, "simply have to retain the ability to produce higher-quality fuels if the consumer demands higher-quality fuels."

An aromatics cap of 25% (vol.), Colucci said, "should help reduce the reactivity of vehicle emissions, produce less engine deposits and contribute to lower benzene emissions."

Since 1975, under lead phasedown, gasoline volatility has risen, Colucci said. Lower Reid vapor pressure (Rvp), he said, reduces vehicle evaporative, running losses and refueling emissions. Although reducing Rvp results in a loss of gasoline octane and volume, Colucci said, "the oil industry should accept this as challenge for its researchers to develop processes to combine C_4s to create high-octane paraffinic C^6s. Another option is to build and run more etherification units.

A volatility limit of 9 psi, Striegler countered, eliminates from gasoline "an awful lot of relatively good fuel called butane." Making automotive engines and the fuel distribution system as vapor-tight as possible would enable future gasoline to continue to use the octane value of butane.

He noted refiners want to know how automakers calibrate the spark retardation in knock sensors to produce gasoline with optimum Research Octane Number and Motor Octane Number.●

JEWISH HERITAGE WEEK

● Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, I rise today along with many of my colleagues, to commemorate Jewish Heritage Week, a period to reflect upon the history of the Jewish people, their culture, accomplishments, and contributions to society.

While I have the warmest feelings toward the Jewish people and I greatly admire their fortitude through the ages, I seek to raise a more solemn note during this Jewish Heritage Week. Today, in the Soviet Union, there hundreds of thousands of Jews—known to the world as Refuseniks—whose visas to emigrate have been denied.

Denial of emigration rights for Soviet Jews, dissidents and divided families has historically been a topic of widespread international concern because it represents a breach of fundamental human liberties. While the Soviet Union has in the past claimed that Soviet Jews have not been mistreated and have no desire to emigrate, it is clear that Jews in the U.S.S.R. have not only been denied the right to leave their country, but also such basic freedoms as cultural and religious expression.

In the 1980's, emigration of Soviet Jews hit bottom as no more than approximately 1,000 Jews were granted exit visas during each year. Under the leadership of President Mikhail Gorbachev, however, 4,000 refuseniks were allowed to emigrate in 1989. And, in 1990, it anticipated that 100,000 Soviet Jews will be permitted to leave Russia for Israel. The increased rate of emigration for Soviet Jews represents a major breakthrough for the Jewish Community around the world. It marks an important step toward the lifting of the bonds which have for so long held Soviet Jews captive.

Although the release of 100,000 Soviet Jews represents substantial progress over the hardships of the past, we must look beyond this incremental progress to a time when all Jews residing in the Soviet Union are allowed the right to freely observe their religion and have the liberty to move and live wherever they please.

One emigration case exemplifying the gross obstruction of basic human liberties and the recent trend in favor of allowing greater emigration, involves the plight of Leonid Lubman. As a "Congressional Call to Conscience," Mr. President, I feel obligated to inform the Senate of the hardships faced by Mr. Lubman during his struggle as a refusenik and his recent victory over the very forces which for years denied him the right to leave.

After graduating from the Leningrad Engineering-Economic Institute in 1970, Lubman worked for the National Scientific Research Institute for Radio Products and Technology where he authored over 60 publications on the Soviet economy. In 1978, after years of being denied his rights to practice Judaism, Lubman submitted papers asking that he be allowed to emigrate. Unfortunately, only a few short days later, and probably not by simple coincidence, he was arrested for trying to send abroad one of his papers which profiled 30 corrupt Soviet officials. Facing charges of distributing anti-Soviet propaganda and revealing classified material, Lubman was sentenced in a closed court to 13 years in a strict regimen labor camp. Although Lubman was not forced to serve the entire 13 years at hard labor, he did subsequently spend over 700 grueling days imprisoned in one of the so-called reformed Soviet psychiatric hospitals. He was not permitted visitors for a 6-year period beginning in 1983, and was denied proper medical care for chronic physical conditions resulting from abusive tortures.

Over the past few years, several dissident leaders and local activists have spoken out on Lubman's behalf. Nobel Peace Prize laureate, Andrei Sakharov appealed for Lubman's release along with Alexei Smirnov who was quoted as saying, "he [Lubman] is an innocent man. All charges against him are fabrication."

Until today, the State Department had included Lubman on a list of political prisoners and human rights activists on whose behalf it was fighting. But, only today, I have received wonderful news. Leonid Lubman has received his visa to emigrate from the Soviet Union and to travel to Israel.

Today, Leonid Lubman symbolizes the predicament of countless Soviet Jews. While Lubman is an example of how Jews have been needlessly punished for attempting to live their lives according to cultural and religious traditions, he also represents the noticeable improvement in the emigration rate.

So, therefore, this Jewish Heritage Week, I seek to call attention to the continuing plight of Soviet Jews. Although like Lubman, many Jews have emigrated from the Soviet Union, hundreds of thousands have yet to receive permission to leave. We as Americans, must not forget the multitudes who remain. And so today, we must redouble our efforts to be tireless advocates for the rights of those who cannot speak for themselves. Only by remembering the plight of the hundreds of thousands of refuseniks who remain, will we be able to let them know that we are both them, and will be, until they are free.●

THE PRESIDENT'S ASIAN STRATEGIC FRAMEWORK REPORT: THE NEED FOR A CONTINUING UNITED STATES MILITARY PRESENCE IN THE PACIFIC, JAPAN, AND SOUTH KOREA

● Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, last year I helped to draft several amendments to the fiscal year 1990 Defense Authorization Act designed to both increase allied efforts to assume more of the burden of our common defense, and to develop a clear long-term plan for our future defense in Asia. The Bush administration has now delivered the report these amendments requested, and has provided the Congress with its plans to create a new strategic framework to shape the U.S. military presence in Asia over the next decade.

I have reviewed that report in depth, and I believe that it is responsive to the changing security environment in Asia and to the growing pressures on our defense budget. I also believe that it proposes steps that will ensure that the United States' vital interests in the Asia-Pacific region continue to be protected.

This proposed strategic framework establishes a viable program for reducing the level of U.S. forces in Asia, it seeks the right kind of military commitments from our allies, and it represents a major effort by the Bush administration to obtain the kind of added contributions to the common defense that are needed from Japan and South Korea.

The Bush administration's strategy is based on a search for regional peace and stability that will allow us to reduce our forces in Asia in three carefully planned phases. The first phase will steadily thin out our existing force structure, and begin rearranging our security relationships over the next 1-3 years. This will lead to some significant savings to the United States taxpayer, involve reductions in our bases and facilities in Asia, and withdraw 7,000 men from South Korea, 5,000-6,000 men from Japan, and 2,000 men from the Philippines.

This represents a reduction of roughly 10-12 percent of our forward deployed manpower in these countries. At the same time, it enables us to continue to play the role of honest broker in Asia and exert a stabilizing influence in what is still a very unstable region.

Looking further into the future, if our search for improved regional peace bears fruit, we could then significantly reduce and reorganize our forces in a second phase over the next 3 to 5 years. Finally, the third phase would allow us to consider major force cuts in the mid to late 1990's—depending upon the changes in regional conditions.

The proposed reductions also take account of the fact that maintaining our presence in Asia is an "economy of force operation" for the United States. The report points out that only 135,000 men, or 6.3 percent of our total force structure is forward deployed in Asian countries. This compares with 16 percent which are forward deployed in the far more geographically compact European theater. In fact, the European theater has over two and a half times the number of forward deployed American forces despite the fact that the Asian-Pacific rim and Indian ocean, all of which come under the Pacific command, represents about half of the Earth's surface.

Equally important, more drastic rapid cutbacks would invoke serious unintended consequences. They could fuel Asian perceptions of a major decline in U.S. strength. We must not inadvertently communicate to Pyongyang, Beijing, Moscow, or other countries that we have lessened our commitment to the region.

THE STRATEGIC SITUATION IN THE PACIFIC

The United States is a Pacific power and must remain so. Five of our seven mutual security commitments are in the Pacific. We have fought three major wars in the Pacific region in the past 45 years. Our current trade across the Pacific amounts to $300 billion annually. This is 50 percent more than our volume of trade with Europe. The United States and Japan, our primarily bilateral partner in the region, together account for about 40 percent of gross worldwide production.

U.S. forces in East Asia have played—and must continue to play—a crucial stabilizing role in the region. Neither we nor the overwhelming majority of states in the Pacific view our military presence as a source of tension. Indeed, our presence is welcomed by all nations in Asia, with the exception of North Korea; and possibly the Soviet Union.

We cannot risk precipitate force cuts in a region where our very presence is a key force for stability. We cannot hope to establish a new and more stable partnership with our Asian allies if we act without consulting them. We cannot hope to establish a stable pattern of trade if we deprive ourselves of strategic credibility. I fully agree with the Bush administration that it would be unwise to withdraw more than the proposed 14,000 to 15,000 troops until we have a clearer picture of what the future holds.

Mr. President, events in Europe are advancing at an incredible pace. Asia, however, has not experienced the same dramatic political changes. The overall strategic situation is changing far more slowly.

CONSIDERING SOVIET CAPABILITIES AS WELL AS SOVIET INTENTIONS

Soviet intentions in Asia are no more threatening than those in Europe, but we cannot afford to focus solely on intentions and ignore capabilities. The Soviets are restructuring their forces in Asia. It is true that they have plans to remove a number of ships from their Pacific fleet over the next few years, and reduce their forces along the Sino-Soviet border.

Nevertheless, we must consider Soviet capabilities as well as Soviet intentions. The Soviets unquestionably feel that they must remain a major military power in the Pacific to protect their vital interests in Siberia, and their far eastern provinces. As a result, they are modernizing the remainder of the Soviet Pacific fleet and its supporting forces. The Soviets are building their first real naval aircraft carriers and maritime power projection forces.

These improvements affect a massive mix of Soviet forces. The Soviets still have 48 maneuver divisions and 3 artillery divisions in Asia, equipped with some 11,500 tanks, 12,500 artillery weapons, and 1,100 helicopters. Their air forces in Asia include some 215 bombers, 890 fighters and fighter attack aircraft and 590 air defense fighters. Their Pacific fleet includes some 575 ships and craft, include 26 SSBN's and SSN's, 94 other submarines, two carriers, 11 cruisers, 8 destroyers, 56 frigates, 21 amphibious ships, 345 additional combat aircraft and helicopters, and a full naval infantry division.

Given current Soviet policy, I do not believe we face a serious threat from these Soviet forces. Nevertheless, we cannot ignore their existence and the fact that a precipitous United States withdrawal from the Pacific would increase the strategic significance of these Soviet forces. Potentially, it could yield the Soviets increased influence in the political and economic affairs of the region.

Such an increase in Soviet capability and influence simply is not in our interest, nor is it in the interest of the progressive elements within the Soviet leadership. It is still tempting for at least some elements in the Soviet Union to try to exploit any power vacuum in northeast Asia or the Pacific.

We also are likely to face a significant political challenge from the U.S.S.R., either this year or next. The U.S.S.R. may offer to return the four islands in the Kuriles which it has held since the end of World War II in return for some form of demilitarization or reduction of Japanese and United States Naval Forces.

Under some conditions, this offer could lead to a stable mix of improved economic relations, confidence building measures, and arms control. It is not, however, likely to have such positive effects if Japan feels it cannot trust American strength or American sensitivity to Japan's security needs.

THE CONTINUING RISKS IN THE KOREAN PENINSULA

We also need to take account of the fact that Asia is not Europe. In Europe, two alliances face off against each other on land. This environment has lent itself to relatively straight forward negotiations, and mutual force reductions designed to eliminate tensions. In Asia, many of the major conflicts and tensions that shape politics, military balance, economics, and national interests have never been dominated by a similar confrontation between the superpowers. Indeed, most countries in Asia do not see the Soviet Union as the principle threat to their interests. Instead, they focus on regional competition as the prime source of instability.

This competition is most severe in terms of North and South Korea. The presence of United States forces has acted as a powerful force in preventing a renewal of conflict between the two Koreas—a conflict that would at least peripherally involve Japan, China, and the Soviet Union.

There is still a threat of conflict on the Korean peninsula despite the progress made by our South Korean allies in their defense forces. Unfortunately, the North Koreans continue to add to their combat capabilities by acquiring more sophisticated weapons from the Soviet Union, by a massive investment in domestic production, and by aggressively seeking to manufacture nuclear weapons.

The Department of Defense has recently published figures that show North Korea has nearly twice the uniformed army manpower of South Korea, more than twice as many tanks, roughly two and one half times as many artillery weapons, far more antiaircraft weapons, twice as many combat aircraft, and roughly twice as many combat ships. I have provided these figures in more detail in a table for the record.

These figures make clear that North Korea is still building up its military forces, and remains one of the most threatening military dictatorships in the world. While forgoing social and economic development.

North Korea spends more on military forces than South Korea although its military manpower costs are only a small fraction of the price of similar manpower to South Korea, and the GNP of North Korea is less than one-quarter of the South's. North Korea forces nearly three times as much of its total population into military service. Kim Il-Sung does not care if his people only get meat once a month—or if there is enough rice to go around—only that his million-plus army has guns and bullets.

It is also interesting, Mr. President, to note that even the U.S.S.R. now admits North Korea has consistently played the role of aggressor. Mr. President, I request that a recent interview with Soviet historian Mikhail Smirnov in the Moscow International Service be made part of the RECORD. This interview shows that even the U.S.S.R. now recognizes that it was North and not South Korea that must assume the blame for the Korean war.

Our military presence in South Korea is already limited, and the Secretary of Defense had made it clear that cuts are possible. At the same time, our military presence plays a critical role in persuading North Korea that it cannot safely attack the South, or continue its current efforts to develop nuclear weapons.

THE OTHER THREATS AND PROBLEMS IN ASIA

The Koreas, however, are only part of the story. Ever since the end of World War II, United States forces in Asia and the Pacific have played a power role in deterring conflict and the escalation of regional tensions. The People's Republic of China still has dangerous tensions with Vietnam and the Soviet Union. Many nations in Asia suffer from serious internal instability, and some—like Cambodia and Burma—are in a constant state of low level civil war.

Our overall military position in Asia and the Pacific plays an important role in assuring Vietnam and Cambodia that they cannot resolve their internal problems by launching foreign adventures, and in assuring Japan and Taiwan that they can remain secure without a massive expansion of their military forces or resorting to some form of proliferation.

There are conflicting territorial claims over the potentially oil-rich Spratly Islands in the South China Sea. We must not let the dispute escalate into a conflict that could adversely affect the economic interests of the United States and allied countries in the region. There are a host of latent racial and ethnic conflicts that could erupt into fighting that could involve some of our major partners in trade.

Leadership will soon pass to a new generation in many countries including North Korea, Vietnam, Cambodia, and China. This may lead to an increased emphasis on democracy, human rights, and economic development. It also, however, could lead to internal instability in selected countries that could spread beyond local borders. The resulting changes in the security and economic environment could easily give rise to new regional powers with national interests that could come in conflict with the United States.

Equally importantly, our Pacific command forces—which also deploy to the Indian Ocean and Persian Gulf—guarantee the security of critical lines of communication in the region for the United States and its allies. We must remember that the peace between Iraq and Iran consists of a one-sided cease-fire. The gulf is still the source of over 50 percent of the world's proven oil reserves and 70 percent of the free world's proven oil reserves. Our ability to project power into the Persian Gulf is not only vital to our own interests, but to those of every major industrial power in the free world.

THE IMPACT OF INCREASED JAPANESE AND SOUTH KOREAN EFFORTS ON OUR FORCE LEVELS

These strategic requirements do not, however, mean that our current force levels must be frozen in place or that we must continue to bear the current heavy financial burdens of deploying them in Asia. As I have already noted, one of my major goals in requiring the department of defense to develop its new strategic framework for Asia was to determine whether we can make limited near term reductions in our support and headquarters strength without affecting our impact on regional stability, and whether our Asian allies understand that the time has come for them to bear a proper share of the burden of regional defense.

The Department's report clearly shows that Japan and South Korea are beginning to respond to their changing economic position by expressing a willingness to take up more of the burden of regional defense and economic aid. It shows that they want to be full partners in our efforts to ensure the security of Asia.

Increases in Japanese and South Korean efforts have already helped us to plan limited reductions in our own forces and to ease the financial strain of deploying the United States forces that must remain in Asia. I believe that both nations can still do far more, but I am encouraged that both the Department of Defense and our new Ambassador for Burden Sharing Report that Japan and South Korea are willing to provide more funding for the maintenance of United States forces deployed in their countries.

Hopefully, Japan now understands that our ability to maintain the kind of deployments called for in the Department's strategic framework are heavily dependent on Japan initiating major new burdensharing initiatives during the course of the present Japanese fiscal year and Japan understands it should set out a clear plan for assuming all yen-based costs of United States forces over the next 3 to 5 years. Hopefully, South Korea understands that it should provide a similar package of initiatives for assuming all won costs—especially those of Korean labor and military construction—if we are to maintain the required deployments in South Korea.

Hopefully, both nations now understand they must take the initiative to provide contributions that directly offset the cost of such deployments to the U.S. taxpayer and the U.S. budget. The political realities of the situation are simple; the United States can only maintain a stable presence in the region if Japan and South Korea take advantage of their growing economic strength to help offset the cost of the disproportionate military efforts of the United States.

I am less sanguine about our ability to remain in the Philippines. I agree that our deployments in that country are of great strategic value, and I share the Department of Defense's hope that we will not be forced out of the Philippines by unrealistic demands for aid. This is an area, however, where I am worried that the Philippine Government doesn't understand that Congress simply will never grant it that major increases in aid that it sought in the past. Also, that the strategic value of such bases is heavily dependent on the government's willingness to create a stable political climate by such measures a major steps in land reform and reductions in corruption.

SUMMARIZING THE IMPACT OF THE PROPOSED STRATEGIC FRAMEWORK FOR THE PACIFIC RIM

In summary, the strategic framework outlined in the Bush administration's Report on the Asian Pacific Rim provides an excellent initial response to the amendments I helped draft to the fiscal year 1990 Defense Authorization Act. It shows that our forward deployed presence in Asia is important and must continue, and that we have too much at stake as a Nation to do otherwise.

At the same time, the framework takes account of greater Japanese and South Korean contributions to our mutual security, but insists that they must do still more in the future. It calls for limited immediate reductions in our present forces and significant near term increases in allied efforts to offset the cost of deploying United States forces.

Finally, the administration's strategic framework provides for a phased, incremental approach to sensibly modify our force structure in Asia. It not only encourages finding alternatives to military force, it demands it. It demonstrates American willingness to take every feasible step to reduce tension in the region. It leaves the door open to further adjustments if other powers are willing to respond with significant changes of their own.

Mr. President, we are in a period of global transition and we should not risk the chances we have to attain a more peaceful world by acting hastily and unwisely. Our primary opponents are not the Soviets, but, as President Bush has said, unpredictability, uncertainty, and instability. In Asia, as elsewhere in the world, we must meet these three challenges with resolution and conviction.

SOVIET HISTORIAN VIEWS WHO STARTED KOREN WAR

[Interview with Soviet historian Mikhail Smirnov by an identified reporter; passages between quotation marks are recording of Smirnov in Russian fading into Korean translation by announcer]

We will carry the talk by Soviet historian Mikhail Smirnov. While expressing his completely personal view on the situation leading up to the 1950–1953 Korean War and a lesson from this war, Mikhail Smirnov said:

"Positive military construction based upon partisan units started in North Korea right after the country was liberated. Pyongyang Military School and Central School charged with training security personnel and similar institutes opened in 1945 and 1946. They became the foundation of the Korean People's Army, which was founded on 8 February 1948.

Similar events also took place on the southern half. A law on founding the national armed forces composed of approximately 100,000 was adopted on 30 November 1948 in the ROK. As a result, new military units and combined units were founded with the direct assistance of Americans. President Syngman Rhee did not express any hope for constructive dialogue with Kim Il-song. Rather, he declared on 30 September 1949:

I firmly believe that, from a psychological perspective, now is the most appropriate time to take aggressive measures. We must drive Kim Il-song's personnel into mountainous areas, where we will gradually starve them to death. At that time, our defense line must be strengthened along the Tuman River and the Yalu River.

These events took place in the wake of a military and political confrontation between the United States and the Soviet Union. The two Korean states exercised the jurisdiction of their respective regime upon the other side's territory [as heard]. Also, confrontational spirits prevailed. What served as an indirect momentum that endorsed the assertion that problems be solved militarily was the victory of the Chinese revolution."

Regarding the reporter's question of what he could say about outside forces' role in the preparations of the Korean War, Mikhail Smirnov said:

"It is clear that outside forces played a role. Just like the Soviet Union gave assistance to North Korea in founding its army, the United States gave similar assistance to South Korea. Without such assistance, neither of the Korean states would have been able to found their armed forces. Therefore, this means that the powers got indirectly involved in the preparations of the Korean War. In addition to this, as a result of the withdrawal of the Soviet and U.S. forces from the Korean peninsula, the political groups in the North and South, which were hostile to each other, could act freely in essence. I think that this is one of the most important factors that helped in the start of the war. Also, I would like to stress that the leaders of the two Korean states respectively had a certain degree of political connections with Washington and Moscow. I think that as a result of the 1950 visit to Moscow by Kim Il-song, the Korean leadership may have come to believe that we supported a military solution to the reunification problem. It may have come to believe so also because of the fact that, in carrying out his activities, Stalin had used such a method."

Foreign historic documents on the Korean War doubtlessly prove the notion that the North Korean sides' acts hastened the start of this war. However, Soviet historians have a completely different view. What do you think of this?

Regarding this question, Mikhail Smirnov said:

"The (?Pyongyang) side prepared this war. Over this issue, the study of history in the Soviet Union has had the following view, that is, approximately 10 divisions of the South Korean armed forces launched a surprise attack across the 38th parallel against the North Korean territory early on the morning of 25 June 1950. I think that all of this is contrary to fact. I think the fact that we have persistently maintained this view for many years can only be explained by the fact that ideology has played an excessive role in the overall aspects of the study of history and, in particular, Soviet-Korean relations. If, believing their power, [alleged] aggressors had started the war, how can it explain the fact that the North's forces occupied Seoul as early as 28 June and later occupied almost 90 percent of the territory of the southern half?"

Regarding the question of whether there is a danger of a breakout of a new war on the Korean peninsula, Mikhail Smirnov said:

"As long as there remains a difference in the political attitudes of the two Korean states toward the division of Korea and how to solve this problem, there will exist such a danger. However, a fundamentally different approach to resolving regional disputes in view of the overall political atmospheres of the world has drastically reduced such a threat. I think that an important lesson from the Korean War is that no dispute can be resolved through means of force [sillyoguibangboburonun]. If there is anything that is solved through means of force, a serious and, at times, tragic accident will not be avoided. Big countries had walked painful roads through Vietnam and Afghanistan for a long time until they realized this truth. It will be a dangerous illusion in the future, too, to continuously adhere to means of force. History has proven to us that we cannot ignore the principle of history and that of social development. There is only one way out, that, is dialogue. The earlier the dialogue starts, the less painful it will be for the reformist procedure participants in such dialogue."●

Whereas the United Nations will celebrate the forty-fifth anniversary of its charter on June 26, 1990;

Whereas Article I of the United Nations Charter establishes the United Nations as "a center for harmonizing the actions of nations";

Whereas on November 10, 1990, fifteen years will have passed since the adoption of United Nations General Assembly Resolution 3379 which formally declared Zionism to be "a form of racism and racial discrimination;

Whereas United Nations General Assembly Resolution 3379 has had as its overt purpose the delegitimation of the State of Israel;

Whereas United Nations General Assembly Resolution 3379 has impeded the struggle against real forms of racial bigotry and has had the incendiary effect of stimulating and encouraging anti-semitism;

Whereas United Nations General Assembly Resolution 3379 has been used to justify terrorist attacks against innocent people;

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from New Hampshire.

LITHUANIA

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, this afternoon members of the Foreign Relations Committee had the distinct honor of meeting with the Prime Minister of Lithuania, Mrs. Prunskiene. This is a lady of grace, but also of very great determination and ability.

Later this afternoon she had a meeting with President Bush, and I commend the President for his decision to meet with her. There was some doubt that he would do so, and had he not I think that would have been very unfortunate and would have been taken very badly by the people of Lithuania. So I commend the President.

But it seems to me notwithstanding that meeting this afternoon our policy toward Lithuania is sadly lacking.

Indeed the vote by the Senate of this past Tuesday, 73 to 24, or some such thing, discouraging the President from sending up to the Senate a recently negotiated trade agreement between the United States and the Soviet Union I think is an indication and I take it as an indication that a large number of Senators share my dissatisfaction with the administration's policy.

In my case it is more than dissatisfaction; I am appalled at the utter lack of response by the administration to the crisis in Lithuania. I am utterly ashamed at the nonresponse of this administration while the Soviets place a noose around the neck of Lithuania, tightening it every day, choking the life out of the economy. The Soviet Army and the KGB security forces have sealed off the border, including the seaports, and more than that they are actively disrupting internal rail traffic and other forms of traffic within Lithuania herself.

This means economic hardship increasingly day by day for the people of Lithuania, and we are not just talking about statistics like Lithuania's national product or economic output. We are talking about human beings, out of work, no income, increasingly as the weeks go by. We are talking about human beings. We are talking about empty cupboards, empty stomachs, hungry children. And what is our response? A brushoff for Lithuania, a brushoff.

It is shocking, and it is shameful, and it is unprincipled.

Last week, Mr. President, we were disheartened by the statement of the leaders of West Germany and of France. In their statements, those leaders encouraged Lithuania to postpone independence. And that was disappointing.

But what is even more disappointing and shocking, we learn from the press, at least the press allege, credible press allege, is that the United States, this administration, was behind it; that the United States engineered and encouraged those statements on the part of the leaders of West Germany and France.

Unfortunately, Secretary Baker is out of the country or I would have spoken with him before discussing these allegations on the floor. But they do seem credible.

According to the New York Times, moreover, Secretary Baker, to quote the Times, "came very close to endorsing the Kremlin's plan for a referendum * * *" on Lithuanian independence.

I hope that is not true, Mr. President. I hope the New York Times is mistaken. The Lithuanians have already had their national referendum, let us recall, just a few months ago—the first free, democratic election in that country since it was annexed unlawfully by the Soviets 50 years ago. And they chose their leadership among several factions. They chose for their leadership predominantly those who advocated independence, reassertion of independence. To suggest that they annul that election and submit to some Moscow-run referendum is preposterous.

They had their referendum. It was called a free election. Yet, support or embracing of the Soviet proposal for a referendum appears to be exactly what Secretary Baker is supporting or came near to supporting according to the New York Times.

It is interesting to note the statements of Yevgeny Primakov, one of President Gorbachev's personal advisers on this matter.

On April 27, the day after President Mitterrand and Chancellor Kohl announced their proposal urging that Lithuania suspend its independence, the Soviet Embassy in Washington released the text of an interview with Mr. Primakov.

In that interview, Mr. Primakov repeats a warning to Lithuania that negotiations will begin only if Lithuania returns to March 10. That is the day prior to the assertions of the independence. In that same interview, last Friday, Mr. Primakov also makes an outrageous claim; he states that an economic blockade of Lithuania "simply does not exist. A blockade means closed borders, cut off supplies of electric power and foodstuff—there is nothing of this kind." That is what he said.

Well, perhaps he was a little behind the news, although that seems unlikely given his high position in the government. There is in fact an economic blockade. The borders are sealed. Internal transport is being disrupted.

The Lithuanians are without oil and oil products. Try to run an economy without oil, sheet metal, white metal, and steel band, all kinds of pipes, plastics, all kinds of rubber, tires, and rubber products, timber products, paper, textiles, trucks, cars, and spare parts, tractors, raw materials for sugar, coffee, vegetable fats, fish and fish products, tea, and margarine, and the list goes on and on. These are the things of which Lithuania is being deprived.

What is the response of the Bush administration? The administration points to Gallup polls which show how popular the President is. Well, that is fine; he deserves to be popular. But Gallup polls do not define principle, Mr. President. And narrow national self-interest does not define a great nation.

There are a lot of interests at stake, it goes without saying, in the relations between the United States and the Soviet Union. And certainly it is in our interests to improve relations, provided the Soviets continue their reforms. But at some point we have to ask: At whose expense do we enjoy these benefits? Are we prepared to indulge ourselves in more trade with the Soviets at the expense of leaving Lithuania behind? I hope not, and yet that appears to be the case.

Are we prepared to pursue economic self-interest at the cost of our principles? I hope not, but that appears to be the case.

Mr. President, I hope President Bush's meeting today is the beginning of a change in the situation, the first step in rectifying our shameful conduct over the last several weeks, the beginning of a new principled and courageous and selfless, or at least less selfish policy toward Lithuania.

It is most unbecoming for us to stand by while the life, the economic life of a valiant people is choked away, day by day by day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would remind the Senator that his 10 minutes time has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I thank the Chair for that reminder and I express once again my hope that today's event will mark the beginning of a new policy toward Lithuania.

ORDER FOR MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today, it stand in recess until 9:30 a.m. tomorrow, Friday, May 4, and that following the time for the two leaders, there be a period for morning business not to extend beyond 10 a.m., with Senators permitted to speak therein for up to 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PROGRAM

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, tomorrow at 10 a.m. the Senate will resume consideration of S. 135, the Hatch Act reform bill, with consideration for the two amendments which I have just described in the previously obtained unanimous consent agreement.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, might I ask a question. We had difficulty today in getting a very voluminous amendment, nine pages. We could not even get it. It was very complex, and we are expected to bring it up and have all the answers here. We defeated that.

But I understand now we cannot get copies yet of the two amendments that are going to come up tomorow. I just would question whether these are going to be the same type of amendments that are very lengthy. If so I think we are going to take longer on the floor tomorrow than perhaps the distinguished leader on the Republican side is willing to spend here. I hope these are simple enough so we can understand them in the morning without going into a lot of study on them and put them off until Monday.

Mr. ROTH. I assure the distinguished chairman that we will not be as long as mine were today. They will be very brief amendments.

Mr. GLENN. When will that be available to us tomorrow morning?

Mr. ROTH. We will make them available as soon as we can get the final draft.

Mr. GLENN. That does not answer my question. When might we get copies, because we come in at 9:30, go on the bill at 10? Can we get copies at 8 o'clock?

Mr. ROTH. We have to refer them to the lawyers on the final draft. We will get them to the Senators.

Mr. GLENN. OK. I urge my colleague not to give us something we cannot understand in the morning on those things, not a nine-page thing like we ran into today.

Mr. ROTH. I would point out to the distinguished chairman at the staff level we have discussed what they will contain.

Mr. GLENN. All right. I yield.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, in any event, I say to our colleague there is no time limit on the amendment tomorrow. So obviously the Senator can take as much time as he wishes.

RECESS UNTIL 9:30 A.M. TOMORROW

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senate will stand in recess until 9:30 a.m., tomorrow.

Thereupon, the Senate, at 8:08 p.m., recessed until Friday, May 4, 1990, at 9:30 a.m.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

SPEECH OF HIS HOLINESS THE DALAI LAMA TO THE EUROPEAN PARLIAMENT

HON. TOM LANTOS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago His Holiness the Dalai Lama spoke to the members of the European Parliament in Brussels. The forum and the timing were most appropriate.

The European Parliament—the legislative body of the European Communities—has increasingly distinguished itself for its outstanding commitment to human rights. As the chairman of the U.S. congressional delegation which meets semiannually with members of the European Parliament, I have been encouraged and inspired by the willingness of our colleagues in the Parliament to speak out in support of fundamental human rights around the world.

The timing of the address of His Holiness was also most appropriate. Chinese authorities announced just a few days ago that they were lifting martial law in the Tibetan capital of Lhasa. While we welcome this gesture, it is only a gesture and a fundamental change in policy toward the people of Tibet is required. Lifting martial law does not restore freedom of speech to the Tibetan people. Lifting martial law does not mean that foreign journalists and international observers will be permitted to visit Tibet and report on human rights violations there. Lifting martial law does not mean that Tibetans will be permitted to practice their religion without threats, hindrances, and legal obstacles. Lifting martial law does not mean that the Tibetan people will be permitted to practice and enjoy their ancient culture. While we welcome the action of Chinese authorities in lifting martial law, we are equally insistent that Chinese authorities must observe the human rights of the tragic and long-suffering Tibetan people.

Mr. Speaker, the address of His Holiness the Dalai Lama is an outstanding statement of the need for the observance of human rights in Tibet. This powerful message of peace and the need for all men to recognize human rights provides yet another confirmation that His Holiness is most deserving of last year's Nobel Peace Prize.

I insert the statement of the Dalai Lama at the European Parliament in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and I urge my colleagues to give it careful and thoughtful attention:

HIS HOLINESS THE DALAI LAMA'S STATEMENT AT THE EUROPEAN PARLIAMENT, BRUSSELS ON APRIL 25, 1990

Brothers and sisters, we are all one human family, and I believe that we have a universal responsibility to care for each other as human beings and for the planet as a whole. The fact that we come from different continents and area or a different race or speak a different language are only superficial. As human beings we are all part of one large family. I am therefore encouraged by your concern for the suffering and the aspirations of the Tibetan people and feel honoured by your invitation to address the Political Affairs Committee of the European Parliament.

The European Community itself is in one sense an example of what I mean by universal responsibility. Here, people have come together as a result of a greater sense of common responsibility and shared vision. I hope that one day all nations will be drawn together out of compassion for, and human understanding of, one another. For on these depend the survival of the world.

Yesterday and today, you have heard testimonies concerning various forms of human rights violations in Tibet. These are but a part of the larger tragic story of the Tibetan people. Because China has closed Tibet to most foreigners, including and in particular journalists and members of human rights organizations, it is very difficult to obtain accurate information on the true conditions in different parts of Tibet. The little information that we do get is from those refugees who manage to flee Tibet and from a few foreign visitors allowed to enter Tibet.

The Tibetan people have suffered tremendously for the last forty years under China's illegal occupation. Tibet was invaded and occupied by the Chinese People's Liberation Army only a few years after World War II ended. Today, as we witness the changes in Eastern Europe, we should bear witness to the colonial yoke that surrounds Tibet, too.

Despite the unimaginable treatment meted out to the Tibetan people by the Chinese, I wish to reiterate my belief that the Tibetan issue can only be resolved through the development of mutual understanding and trust between the Tibetans and the Chinese. This, in turn, can be achieved only through open and honest discussions keeping in view the aspirations and interests of the six million Tibetans. It cannot be achieved through brutal repression and intimidation. Violence, in my opinion, only breeds hatred and more violence, and cannot form the basis for a lasting solution.

As I am sure you are aware, I have consistently called for earnest negotiations between Tibetan and Chinese representatives. I have proposed this for the benefit of both the Tibetan and Chinese people and not out of concern for my own position or future.

Two and a half years ago, I proposed a Five Point Peace Plan for Tibet which I elaborated on during a visit to the European Parliament in 1988. Although, the Chinese initially agreed to hold negotiations with my representatives at a place and time of my choosing, they have, for one reason or another, always evaded giving a direct response. We have yet to receive a constructive response from the Chinese.

Since June of last year, when the brave Chinese students and their supporters were massacred in Beijing in a manner which is all too familiar to us Tibetans, the hardened Chinese leadership has discontinued even the sporadic contact we had maintained with them. Today, instead of dialogue, there is increased repression in Tibet. The human rights of the Tibetan people are constantly being violated.

The Tibetan people surely have the right to be free and happy. And Tibet which is culturally, racially, geographically and historically distinct from China has the right to decide its own destiny, just as other colonized or victimized peoples do.

The vision we Tibetans have of a future Tibet is that of a peaceful plateau governed in a true democratic manner—where the chief executive, the government, and the parliament are elected by the people; where the rule of law, human rights and democratic freedoms are guaranteed in a constitution adopted by the people; and where the environment is protected and all forms of life respected. This region would eventually have to be demilitarized and denuclearized. A Tibetan zone of peace would benefit not only the Tibetan people, but would also be in the interest of regional peace and stability and of the environment which concerns all of us.

For us Tibetans, the study and practice of Buddhism is very important, because we believe that it has real value in helping us to become better, more compassionate human beings, through the development of inner peace and respect for all forms of life. I further believe that Buddhist principles will enable us to contribute to world peace and the conservation of our planet's environment. However, it is not only the Buddhists who can make such a contribution. It is my conviction that followers of both, of any religion and no religion, can do the same. What is essential to us is that all people must be free to follow their own beliefs as they see fit.

Tibetans who have managed to escape from Tibet in the past decades have learned much from democracy. But even though Tibetans inside Tibet have been deprived of the opportunity to experience or learn about democracy under what the Chinese government calls the "dictatorship of the proletariat", they have developed a keen interest in democracy and long for the rights and freedoms people in other countries enjoy, and sometimes, take for granted.

The changes that have taken place in Eastern Europe, Central Asia and Africa have given us renewed hope and courage. If people, long repressed, can regain their freedom and create democratic and humane societies, why not the Tibetans? The democracy movement in China has also given us reason to be optimistic. If tomorrow's leaders of China truly believe in democracy, how can they fail to respect the Tibetan people's wishes? Imperialism and true democracy are incompatible, and most Chinese students whom I have recently met seem to understand that.

The Tibetan people have waged a non-violent struggle for many years. Throughout this time our determination has not weakened. As I have said, we remain willing and prepared to talk to the Chinese leadership, because I believe that dialogue is important.

As democratically elected leaders and representatives of the peoples of Europe, you can do much to help bring change to Tibet. Your public expressions of concern for the plight of the Tibetan people and support for their legitimate rights not only give us Tibetans renewed courage, but also remind China that the international community does care about the Tibetan people and that China cannot suppress or eliminate a country and people without being accountable to the international community.

To conclude, I wish to take this opportunity to thank you for your interest, and the interest of the people you represent throughout the European community.

A TRIBUTE TO BROWN ELEMENTARY SCHOOL FOR THEIR NATIONALLY RECOGNIZED DRUG-FREE PROGRAM

HON. JACK BUECHNER

OF MISSOURI

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. BUECHNER. Mr. Speaker, the war on drugs has turned the streets of our neighborhoods and playgrounds at our schools into battlefields. If we are to take back our homes, schools, and communities, the battle must be fought on the home front—each and every individual will have to be a soldier.

Recently, the Department of Education announced the selection of 51 schools from across the Nation to be recognized for their outstanding drug-free programs. It is with a deep sense of pride that I pay tribute today to Brown Elementary School in the Hazelwood School District of St. Louis County in my home State of Missouri. The administration and teachers at Brown Elementary School understand the seriousness of the drug war and are supplying their students with the most effective weapon available to defeat the scourge of drugs: education.

The Brown Elementary School's drug prevention awareness program is a well coordinated plan that brings together students, faculty, parents, and the community to take the offense in confronting the issue of substance abuse. Every student from kindergarten through sixth grade learns that they alone must ultimately be responsible for their own mind, body, and spirit.

The faculty at Brown Elementary School have found that children do have a genuine thirst for knowledge, especially when they are involved in the actual process of learning. A key element of the school's program is engendering a sense of self-worth in every student. The school has succeeded in this area by engaging students in activities designed to make learning a more dynamic experience. Activities such as plays, musicals, and other creative programs elicit a sense of accomplishment and confidence in the children. These are essential for building the character required to resist peer pressure and to say "no" to drugs.

Mr. Speaker, the drug problem in America is not one of supply but of demand. As long as people are willing to use and pay for illegal drugs, the drug lords will find a way to provide them. This fight cannot be fought by law enforcement alone. Public attitudes must change the tolerance level of substance abuse to a level of total intolerance.

Brown Elementary School is a beacon of light for our community. They have taken the battle against drugs to the front lines and placed the fate of victory with individual accountability. It's time to enlist everyone in the war against drugs. Only then will we have a fighting chance to win.

WHAT ARE WE WAITING FOR IN HAITI?

HON. GEO. W. CROCKETT, JR.

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. CROCKETT. Mr. Speaker, in a recent op ed in the Boston Globe, Lester Hyman, former Washington counsel for the Government of Haiti, makes a compelling case for aid to Haiti. He reminds us of the debt we owe the Haitians for their contribution to our revolution of 1776. He goes on to say:

The United States has taken risks before in the name of democracy. Why should we not do so again for a friend just 700 miles from our shores? It is in our national interest to promote democracy in this hemisphere. Haiti came to our aid when we sought our freedom. Now is the time for us to help Haiti seek its freedom.

The situation in Haiti is the best it has been for years. Finally, an interim civilian government, not the military apparatus, has control of Haiti. The interim President, Supreme Court Justice Ertha Pascal-Trouillot, has an uphill struggle ahead of her, and she can not win without resources.

The tragic irony is that it would only take a small amount of money to make a difference in Haiti. The $20 million authorized by the House Foreign Affairs Committee would have gone a long way toward assisting the Haitian people with critical imports and their elections. I am saddened by the fact that instead of $20 million, the appropriations committees will probably settle for $3 million in new money. Meanwhile, they appropriated over $700 million for Panama and Nicaragua.

I am further frustrated by the administration's unwillingness to place Haiti high on the foreign policy priority list. The U.S. Government talks a great deal about promoting democracy around the world. We have supported guerrilla movements to the tune of billions of dollars, and even gone so far as sending U.S. troops to others' shores—all in the name of democracy. Why is it the administration can find discretionary funds for other countries in their times of crisis, can request almost a billion dollars for the emerging democracies of Panama and Nicaragua and yet remain silent on Haiti?

No one's hands are clean on Haiti. And we will only have ourselves to blame if the Haitian people fail in their struggle toward democracy for lack of funds. It is my hope that we will realize the error of our ways before it is too late.

The text of Mr. Hyman's article follows:

[From the Boston Globe, Apr. 23, 1990]

PAYING U.S. DEBT TO HAITI

(By Lester S. Hyman)

WASHINGTON.—The US Congress now is considering a foreign aid package. One possible component is $20 million in aid to Haiti.

It is in our national interest to grant it.

At the dawn of its independence, Haiti sought US recognition—and was rejected.

Now, 187 years later, a new leader of Haiti has been chosen by civilians rather than soldiers. Will the United States reject Haiti again in its hour of need? History tells us we should not.

The two countries' ties, unknown to most Americans, go back to our Revolutionary War and put the United States in Haiti's debt.

In 1778, the French rules of Haiti dispatched a contingent of slaves to Savannah, Ga., where 518 of their number gave their lives to help make America free.

One Haitian slave who fought for the United States, Henry Christophe, realized from his experience that a people could rid itself of oppressive rule.

So Christophe returned to Haiti and led a slave revolution against the bloody abuses of the French.

In 1803, the victorious Haitian slaves established their own nation—the first independent black republic in history.

Yet, when they sought recognition of the very United States they bravely had fought for only a few years before, we not only refused but also slapped a trade embargo on the fledging black republic.

Why? Because in 1803 the United States maintained a slave economy and could not tolerate the thought of a successful slave revolt spreading to our shores.

Deprived of models of governance from the democratic nations of the area, Haiti's contemporary history has been one of coups, dictatorships and instability.

In September of 1988, the enlisted men in the Army installed as president Prosper Avril, who initially took steps to restore the constitution, curb corruption, reduce the transshipment of drugs and, most important, announced elections for next October for a civilian president.

In January, however, Avril inexplicably did an about-face and cracked down on his political critics. His support quickly eroded and on March 10, after 18 months in office, Avril resigned. Now an interim civilian president, Haitian Supreme Court Justice Ertha Pascal-Trouillot, has been installed. Her primary task will be to bring about the free election that Avril promised.

But getting from here to there will be no easy task.

Haiti desperately needs US help to feed its people and build an infrastructure. Oil and wheat are to Haiti what bread and water are to human life, but it lacks the funds for either.

It would take $15 million in US aid to pay for enough fuel and food to get through the national elections in October; $5 million more would underwrite the elections.

Thus far, we have done nothing. And our inaction emboldens the opposition forces.

We say to the people of Haiti: first hold peaceful elections and then we will help. But unless the United States helps now, the chances for peaceful elections become less likely.

What, then, is the problem?

First, the United States, having been burned before (the election disaster of 1987), is afraid to stick its neck out again.

Second, Haiti is a very poor country without a vibrant economic base, so it does not register high on our list of foreign policy concerns.

Third, the Congress and the administration each want the other to go first for fear of taking the blame if something goes wrong.

The United States has taken risks before in the name of democracy. Why should we not do so again for a friend just 700 miles from our shores? It is in our national interest to promote democracy in this hemisphere.

Haiti came to our aid when we sought our freedom. Now is the time for us to help Haiti seek its freedom.

PRESIDENT JIMMY CARTER, PROMOTER OF PEACE

HON. GERRY SIKORSKI

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. SIKORSKI. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to introduce a letter into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD from a fellow Minnesotan. On April 25, the world witnessed a monumental occasion in Nicaragua. After a free election, a new President has taken office in this impoverished, war-torn country. Under the leadership of Violeta Barrios de Chamorro, peace and democracy may soon become a long-term reality in Nicaragua. This is a tribute to the people of Nicaragua, without whom this peaceful transition could not have happened. This is also a tribute to dedicated efforts of President Jimmy Carter. President Carter worked tirelessly to ensure that the Nicaraguan Presidential election and transition of power were conducted without fraud and manipulation. In the March 25, 1990 St. Paul Pioneer Press, Gordon Oberg wrote of the virtues of our emminent former President. For his unceasing devotion to attain world peace, President Carter should be commended.

JIMMY CARTER, PREACHER, PROMOTER OF PEACE

Recently my wife and I spent a pleasant, meaningful Sunday morning in Plains, Ga. Prior to the morning worship service at the Maranatha Baptist Church, we had the opportunity and privilege of attending the adult Sunday school class taught by former President Jimmy Carter. This gentle, unpretentious man exhibits the attributes of confidence, leadership and wisdom, coupled with the virtues of humility, honesty and integrity. Among American presidents, he stands tall. His gracious wife complements his stature.

Recently President Carter helped monitor the elections in Nicaragua. His work has been lauded by leaders of both our major political parties. In the near future he will be meeting with leaders in Israel, Egypt and Libya. I hope our government will continue to utilize the talents and expertise of this man in helping to promote the cause of peace, justice and human rights among the nations of our world.

RECOGNIZING BEECHER CLARK, NATIONAL BLIND WORKER OF THE YEAR

HON. MEL LEVINE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate Mr. Beecher Clark on his selection as winner of the Peter J. Salmon Award recognizing the National Blind Worker of the Year. Mr. Clark's achievements in the face of adversity should serve as an inspiration not only to other physcially challenged people, but to all people.

Legally blind since birth, Mr. Clark has overcome this disability and a painful struggle with alcoholism to become an example and a leader to his fellow workers at Ed Lindsay Industries. He has performed admirably in every department of the company and serves as an employee spokesperson on many issues as a longtime member of the Ed Lindsay Employee Advisory Committee.

In addition, Mr. Clark is an active community leader who has not allowed his disability to prevent him from helping others to overcome the problems with which he has been faced. For the past 18 years he has organized alcohol therapy groups for inmates at Tennessee State Prison and participates in therapy groups at other institutions. He is also active in the Mid-State Association of the Tennessee Council of the Blind, having held local and State offices. In the words of W. Allen Broughton, executive vice president of Ed Lindsay:

The onset of total blindness . . . has not diminished Clark's enthusiasm for producing quality products or actively participating in community activities.

It would be a fitting to the invaluable contributions Mr. Clark and other physically challenged Americans have made to our society if we guarantee the protection of their rights through passage of the Americans with Disabilities Act. This landmark legislation will remove many of the obstables to success which Mr. Clark faced from the path of others like him. There is no greater gift we in Congress can give in recognition of his extraordinary achievements.

I ask my colleagues to join me in recognizing the accomplishment of a remarkable man.

ERIC McNAUGHTON BRACKETT: A LIFETIME OF SERVICE

HON. NITA M. LOWEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mrs. LOWEY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of my colleagues to the honor which is being bestowed upon Eric McNaughton Brackett. Mr. Brackett will be honored by the All Islands Association at their annual scholarship luncheon.

Mr. Brackett is being honored for his lifetime of commitment to his community. He was born in the country of Belize where he attended Wesley College. After graduation, he traveled to Guatemala where he worked for the United Fruit Co. until Hurricane Hattie forced its closure by destroying the banana farms in Guatemala.

In 1969 he came to the United States where he visited both Los Angeles and Manhatten before deciding to settle in Mount Vernon. He began his service to his community in 1974 when William B. Johnson asked him for his assistance in reorganizing the South Side Residents Association. He then became involved with the Mount Vernon Community Action Group which led to greater involvement in more community groups.

In 1976, he joined Asbury United Methodist Church where he was asked to be a Sunday school teacher. He has since served in many different capacities in the local church, on the district and conference level. In 1980, he became an American citizen so that he would have all doors opened to him whenever he tried to help any one in need.

Mr. Brackett is a Metropolitan Life Insurance representative. He is currently serving in many positions of prominence throughout his community including: Chairman of the mayor's advisory committee in Mount Vernon; chairman of Westchester's Community Opportunity Program; president of the Housing and Neighborhood Development Institute; and president of the South Side Residents Association. In addition he is a member of the executive committee of the Mount Vernon branch of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

Brackett has been honored by several organizations, including the Mount Vernon Police Benevolent Association, which gave him his first civilian award in 1985, and the Belizean Cultural Society of New York which honored him in 1988.

With regard to his unswerving commitment on behalf of this community, the honor bestowed upon Mr. Brackett is richly deserved. I highly commend the All Island Association for deciding to honor such an outstanding and meritorious American. This is an honor which is richly deserved.

EL CINCO DE MAYO

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, recent world events have forced this great Nation to reflect upon the profound traditions by which it was formed. We have all watched in awe as many parts of the world have undergone a massive transformation from Communist oppression to the democratic rule of the people. While many of these events have taken place halfway across the globe, in cultures distinctly different from our own, there is a personal understanding of their struggle in each American's heart. After all, this country was founded on the principles of freedom, and the long struggle to obtain them. And while our struggle for freedom and independence from British rule is unique, Mexico, our good neighbor to the south, remembers her own unique struggle.

Cinco de Mayo, the fifth of May, is the anniversary of the 1862 Mexican Battle of Puebla. This day marks the anniversary of the battle in which the Mexican forces, against overwhelming odds, defeated French invaders who tried to change the course of their nation. This much-celebrated battle ensued when French Emperor Napoleon III, eager to establish a centralized monarchy in Mexico under French control, started a campaign of conquest. With 6,000 of his choice troops, the commander of the French forces encroached upon Mexico in what he expected to be an immediate and effortless victory. However, much to his dismay, 2,000 courageous Mexican soldiers drove the men back and won the day.

Although the French eventually conquered the country, the victory was extremely momentous. More important than the triumph itself, however, and its historic significance to the Mexican people is the never-ending message it sent to the world. The Battle of Puebla displayed to all nations the world. The Battle of Puebla displayed to all nations the unbeatable valor of a people committed to their homeland and culture, and the raw power behind a people's commitment to the principles of freedom. This historic battle, fought in Mexico 128 years ago, still rages on today throughout the world. Yet, the Battle of Puebla has shown humanity that the struggle for freedom, and from oppression, must continue. Moreover, Mexico has shown the world that this battle can be won.

Mr. Speaker, let the world honor our good neighbor to the south on Cinco de Mayo. We join with our Mexican friends and neighbors, in the celebration of this great battle and this great victory. It is truly a worldwide celebration of country, spirit, and freedom.

IN RECOGNITION OF STEPHEN R. CHAPIN, JR., U.S. NAVY

HON. HELEN DELICH BENTLEY

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mrs. BENTLEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to recognize and honor Lt. Stephen R. Chapin, Jr., U.S. Navy, for his outstanding service as liaison officer for the Secretary of the Navy to the House of Representatives.

Hailing from Maryland, Lieutenant Chapin was selected for his demanding and important assignment based on his proven performance as a fully qualified surface warfare officer. He served with distinction as ordnance officer, damage control assistant, and auxiliaries officer in U.S.S. Doyle (FFG–39) during several extended deployments to the Mediterranean Sea, Indian Ocean, and Persian Gulf.

During his tour on Capitol Hill, I and many of my colleagues have greatly relied on Lieutenant Chapin's unfaltering dedication to his duties as well as his unique expertise. It is my understanding that upon completion of his current assignment that Lieutenant Chapin will transfer from the active forces to the Naval Reserve and continue his national service as citizen-soldier returning home to the Free State of Maryland. It gives me great pleasure on this occasion to recognize Steve's achievements and to say thank you for a job well done.

CHICOPEE, MA, CENTENNIAL

HON. RICHARD E. NEAL

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. NEAL of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I take this opportunity to salute the people of Chicopee, MA, on the occasion of the 100th anniversary of the founding of the city. The Chicopee Centennial Committee has worked hard to prepare for a year-long celebration of this historic occasion. It promises to be quite a memorable year in Chicopee, starting with a major parade this weekend.

The community of Chicopee has a history that stretches back hundreds of years before the city was officially founded in 1890. "Chicopee" is a Nipmuck Indian word meaning Birchbark Place. Throughout history, settlers of many types have favored the beautiful valley where today the city of Chicopee sits. The first settlers were the Nipmuck Indian Tribe. They were followed by the Puritans, who in 1636 received permission from the general court of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts to settle in the valley of the Connecticut River. The area where the Connecticut River meets the Chicopee River was first known for its excellent soil for farming. It attracted the Puritans who settled in the Springfield area and today some of the descendants of these early settlers still live in the Chicopee area. I have included a short history of Chicopee for my colleagues. As in the case of many great cities, the history of Chicopee is the history of people. Over the years Irish, Polish, French, Portuguese, and Italian people, among others, have come to Chicopee to live and to work. It is their hard work that has built Chicopee into the vibrant city it is today. Many great Americans have been born or lived in Chicopee; writer Edward Bellamy, Massachusetts Gov. George Dexter Robinson, Gen. Arthur MacArthur, industrialists Thomas Wright, and Joshua Stevens among them.

I would also like to note the contribution of the city of Chicopee to the U.S. Capitol. The magnificant bronze doors that are on display in the east and west entrances to the Capitol were cast at the Ames Co. of Chicopee in 1865. This massive task took 2 years and was supervised by Silas Mosman. I urge my colleagues to stop for a moment before these doors and note the magnificent craftwork that went into these national treasures. Whenever I see these works of art, I take pride in having the honor of representing the city of Chicopee.

Mr. Speaker, I would also like to take this opportunity to mention the people who make up the Chicopee Centennial Committee: Chairman Richard Wylie, Mayor Joseph Chessey, Jr., Sandra Chessey, John Frykenberg, Claudia Harriman, Lucille Kolish, Robert Motley, Diane Murphy, W. Guy Ormsby, Joseph Wagner, and Shera Cohen. This group, and many others have put together an impressive centennial celebration of events for Chicopee. I intend to join the many people around western Massachusetts who will enjoy this joyous occasion over the coming months. Congratulations to the people of Chicopee on a fine century of achievement.

The "History of Chicopee" follows:

HISTORY OF CHICOPEE

The History of Chicopee is one of continuous immigration. The Nipmuck Indians were the first settlers of the Connecticut River Valley who called the Connecticut River the "Long or Great River." The Swift, Ware and Quabog Rivers merge near the town of Three Rivers to form the Chicopee River. The river was so named by local Indians before the advent of the white man. The word "Chicopee" means Birchbark Place.

In 1636 the General Court of the Massachusetts Bay Colony granted permission to the Puritans to settle in the valley of the Connecticut River.

In 1659, the sons of Deacon Samuel Chapin brought their wives and children to settle and farm the Chicopee Meadows. By 1749 there were 40 voters in the region, a large enough group to warrant the establishment of their own church. A site on Chicopee Street was selected and served as a meeting house as well as a place of worship. The Reverend John McKinstry served as pastor of the First Congregational Church. The present building, constructed in 1826, is the oldest church structure in the city. Chicopee was then called the fifth parish of Springfield.

In 1825, from Eastern Massachusetts, Francis Lowell brought capitalism to the Connecticut Valley. Under a plan devised by Lowell, the cotton mills were to utilize the power loom and consolidate all the various processes of production in one plant. The company, which in 1828 became the Chicopee Manufacturing Co., was more than a cotton mill. It owned a large tract of land, water power, and a machine shop to repair mill equipment. The company laid out streets, set up a school district, and constructed tenements and boardinghouses for the workers.

At the western ford in the Chicopee River, in 1829, Nathan Peabody Ames and James Tyler Ames arrived from Chelmsford. The Ames Company would eventually produce a variety of metal products, both military and industrial.

They were soon joined by Alonso Philips of Hartford, who with Daniel Monroe Chapin developed America's first friction match industry. Benning Levitt started a bobbin shop, and Steven Bemis organized a hardware business here in Factory Village. From Springfield, Edmund Dwight came to develop the Dwight Textile Mills in Cabotville.

In 1832 a number of Irish immigrants came to Chicopee to work on the canals and to help construct the railroad. In 1849, Irish labor helped to construct the Connecticut River Railway. This majestic accomplishment would make Chicopee a first rate industrial center.

In 1845, Thomas Wright and Joshua Stevens came and began producing firearms in Chicopee Falls. The plant has now surrendered to urban renewal. The Stevens Arms Co. produced the famous Maynard Rifle. The Mexican War in 1845 led to increased production. Employment at the company rose to nearly 100.

On April 29, 1848 the Massachusetts General Court approved legislation to establish the town of Chicopee. In 1858 at least 60% of the mill population was Irish and the immigrant Irish, in 1859, constructed a magnificent church on South Street in Cabotville. On the South Street land, the parish soon constructed a school, followed by the construction of a fine rectory. By 1860, Chicopee was a town of only 7,000 people; yet 751 Chicopee soldiers and sailors served the Union cause. The Irish were a substantial part of the town's military contribution.

During the war, The Ames Co. produced weaponry for the North's Armies. The cotton mills manufactured uniforms. The mill sent labor recruiters north to seek mill workers. From the Canadian province of Quebec, girls were brought to Chicopee to work in the cotton mills. Later French-Canadian men were also recruited. The French-Canadian immigrants settled in Willimansett and it wasn't long before the stones of their own churches were set.

One of the greatest accomplishments of the Ames Company was the casting of the bronze doors of the east and west wings at the Capital building in Washington. In 1853, Thomas Crawford, a noted American sculptor was commissioned by the U.S. Government to design doors for the east and west wings of the newly remodeled Capitol building in Washington, D.C. Crawford worked on these designs for several years, until his death. The designs were completed by William Rinehart of Maryland. Once the designs were completed, they were put into storage and never reached the Ames firm until 1865. Silas Mosman, the casting expert, was put in charge of the work. The cast was cut, chased and finished in about two years at a cost of approximately $65,000.

The expanding factory system brought the first Polish Immigrants to Chicopee. The mailboat to Europe carried news of Chicopee and many of their country men were guided to the valley, St. Stanislaus Parish provided safe harbor in a strange new land.

In 1871, Charles E. Parker designed the fine brick and stone building that still serves as the seat of elected power in the city. The design of Chicopee City Hall, patterned after the Palazzo Vecchio in Florence, Italy, is the city's most distinctive landmark. The communities power and influence in state politics produced a governor in 1883. George Dexter Robinson, teacher, lawyer, congressman and bank president became governor of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

Rufus Bellamy had been the Baptist Minister in Chicopee Falls for thirty-five years. His son, Edward, was not destined to follow in his father's footsteps. Edward and his brother Charles founded the Springfield Daily News in 1880. Edward served as Editorial Writer for the paper and published in the early 1880's; Looking Backward. published in 1888, sold over a million in its first few years and has been steadily in print all over the Western world ever since.

1890 provided another landmark year for Chicopee. The original Charter of the City of Chicopee was granted by the Massachusetts General Court on April 18, 1890, and adopted by the qualified voters of the Town of Chicopee at a meeting held May 6, 1890. George S. Taylor was inaugurated as Chicopee's first mayor on January 5, 1891.

In 1939, the Tobacco Plains of Chicopee Falls were transformed into the Northeast Air Force Base, Westover Field. Today Westover Field is the home of the free world's largest aircraft, the C5 Galaxy.

THE SEARCH FOR THE DIABETES GENE

HON. E de la GARZA

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, diabetes affects 12 million Americans and adds an estimated $20 billion annually to our Nation's health care costs. A half million people in this country die of diabetes and its complications each year.

Research has shown that a disproportionately high percentage of Americans affected by diabetes are of African, Native American, Native Hawaiian, or Hispanic ancestry. For example, black women are twice as likely to suffer from diabetes as white women. Aging Hispanics are also more likely to have diabetes than the general population, with one-third of the group between 65 and 74 years of age likely to suffer from the disease.

Diabetes and its complications add an estimated $20 billion annually to our Nation's health-care costs, a significant portion of which includes Federal spending for the Medicare, Medicaid, and Social Security disability programs. Diabetics make up about 30 percent of the new dialysis patients entering the Medicare End Stage Renal Disease [ESRD] program each year. Federal Medicare costs for treatment for diabetes-related ESRD alone runs about $750 million annually.

As chairman of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus, I am deeply concerned about the prevalence of diabetes among my fellow Hispanics and want to ensure that everything possible is being done to find a cure.

On April 26, 1990, I attended the Capitol Hill Conference on Diabetes. This conference was called to focus public attention on the disturbing statistics surrounding diabetes, particularly its prevalence among minorities and its increasing costs in terms of health care.

The conference underscored the opportunity that now exists to use modern technology and genetic research to find the cause and possibly a cure to diabetes by the end of this century. A new research initiative, "The Search for the Diabetes Genes," has been proposed which would commit an additional $50 million in Federal funds for the diabetes genetic research activities sponsored by the National Institute of Diabetes and Digestive and Kidney Diseases [NIDDK], a part of the National Institutes of Health.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to continue their support for funding of the valuable research activities currently sponsored by NIDDK. And I strongly recommend we find room in the Federal budget to help fund "The Search for the Diabetes Genes." The opportunity to find the cause and the cure of this disease is an opportunity we should not ignore.

TRIBUTE TO EARTH DAY

HON. MARY ROSE OAKAR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, Sunday, April 22d, was observed as the 20th anniversary of "Earth Day" and it was a truly global celebration.

My memory goes back to the original Earth Day in 1970, when its founder, Senator GAYLORD NELSON, flew from Boston to Washington to the University of Wisconsin at Madison to launch a teach-in on the environment for students at 2,000 colleges, 10,000 secondary schools, and 1,000 communities in America.

This Sunday, an estimated 200 million people in 3,600 communities in 140 countries on 7 continents turned out for a variety of rallies, marches, concerts, festivals, and street fairs. These and other events added up, in the words of the New York Times, to "the largest grass-roots demonstration in history." To me, this means it was a genuine showing of sentiment of the people and by the people, rather than being organized by any government. This makes Earth Day 1990 highly significant, as an indication that the peoples of the earth are ahead of their governments in this vital area.

I would like to join in having the Congress pay tribute to Earth Day and to one of its most distinguished members—Senator NELSON—a former Governor of Wisconsin, a Democrat, a lifelong conservationist, and now, senior counsellor of the Wilderness Society. It was his extraordinary vision and leadership that made Earth Day a reality. In 1970, the Senator told the Wisconsin student body:

> Our goal is an environment of decency, quality, and mutual respect for all other human creatures and for all other living creatures. * * * A tougher challenge than any other war in the history of man. * * *

I would also like to recognize the leadership in and dedication to environmental matters of such organizations as the Audubon Society, Resources for the Future, the Alliance To Save Energy, the Public Interest Research Group, the American Council for an Energy Efficient Economy, the National Resources Defense Council, the Consumer Federation of America, and the Council for Renewable Energy Education. All have contributed substantially to the work of the Subcommittee on Economic Stabilization, which I chair, in exploring the relationships between energy, environment, and long-term national security. As a part of these hearings, we were able to arrange the first presentations of the national energy efficiency platform and a national policy for renewable and alternative fuels for congressional consideration.

There is a parallel in that the original Earth Day was, according to Senator NELSON, prompted by the Santa Barbara oilspill of 1969, and our hearings commenced as a result of the Valdez oilspill of 1989.

My hope is that Earth Day will continue to serve as a focus for the expression of environmental concerns and advocacy in behalf of this planet that all of us share.

An Earth Day editorial by the Washington Post credited environmental campaigns with some ringing successes. It is encouraging that, since the first Clean Air Act of 1970, practically all of the lead emissions have been eliminated and sulfur dioxide emissions have been reduced more than 20 percent.

The Post says that our most important discovery is that "conservation"—which to me means caring for the land—and/or energy efficiency, "is the cheapest, simplest, and most effective way to make progress." An example would be that gasoline mileage has just about doubled since 1973. The proof that environmental progress and economic growth are consistent is that the economy has grown by about three-quarters during this period ("Earth Day," Sunday, April 22, 1990, page B-6).

The New York Times reported that the environmental focus has shifted in the past 20 years from localized concerns, such as the status of the bald eagle—transferred from the "endangered" to the "threatened" list—to problems of the whole Earth, such as the ozone layer, climatic change, clean air, drinking water, the forests, oceans, lakes, and soil "Guarding the Environment: A World of Challenges," by Matthew Wald, April 22, 1990, page 1. And, I might add, urban living conditions—jobs, housing, health, safety, and education.

Much has been done; much more remains to be done.

A lead article in the New Republic Magazine also challenged environmentalists to be critical of mythology in this field, to be respectful about facts and the scientific method, and costs and benefits. "Everything You Know About the Environment Is Wrong," By Gregg Easterbrook, April 30, 1990, page 14. In my opinion observance of these fundamental principles will strengthen environmental policies over the long run as realistic and well managed. An example, that is close to home, would be that all concerned should thoroughly examine the advantages of clean coal technology as part of the current clean air debate.

It is inspiring to me to see millions of people around the world responding to the cause set in motion 20 years ago by a Member of Congress to seek a decent and clean environment for all living creatures.

That kind of people power is needed to win the often technical and always difficult contests necessary to restore a proper balance between mankind and our environment. As columnist William Raspberry pointed out, individuals cannot do it all; sustained environmental improvement requires some responsible governmental action "How Earth Day Failed," Washington Post, April 25, 1990, page A27.

A prime example is the congressional effort—unsuccessful so far—to have the administration to produce a national energy policy. Such a policy was called for by Congress in 1977, in order to provide guidance in reconciling the legitimate interests of energy producers, consumers, and the environment, and to avoid undue dependence on foreign sources of energy. Another is to move forward with a program for greater energy efficiency in building and housing, the largest energy using segment of our society, which I have proposed.

As the glow of Earth Day 1990 fades, I hope the environment remains front page news. I am proud to be part of the environmental tradition, and will be doing all I can in this body to advance this cause.

THE WORLD BANK AND CENTRAL EUROPE

HON. JOHN J. LaFALCE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. LaFALCE. Mr. Speaker, perhaps the greatest political event of the past generation is now unfolding in central Europe as citizens are throwing off four decades of Communist rule.

Last year brought dramatic political breakthroughs which are being institutionalized with elections throughout the region during 1990. But it will take the rest of the decade before the countries of central Europe can make a full transformation to market economies and free enterprise.

Last year, the Congress passed the SEED I legislation to help Poland and Hungary make this transition. Next week, we are scheduled to take another step by approving SEED II legislation to expand the programs and coverage to other countries. Both these bills are needed—and much more. As the head of a 13-member congressional delegation which recently visited Yugoslavia, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, Poland, and East Germany, I know just how great is the will, and so limited are the resources in those countries. As a result, I have introduced a Central European Outreach bill (H.R. 4624) which goes beyond both SEED I and SEED II, and offers additional and much-needed help to these deserving countries.

I have also introduced legislation—H.R. 4569—to allow debt for environment swaps in Central Europe, and have proposed an Environmental Trust Fund for the newly established European Bank for Reconstruction and Development.

Central Europe represents both a moral imperative and economic opportunity for the United States at this moment in history. Accordingly, I have been very pleased that the World Bank has been moving aggressively to help countries in central Europe make the difficult transition to market economies. I want to draw particular attention to Members of a recent speech delivered in Warsaw by an esteemed former colleague, Barber Conable, now president of the World Bank, followed by an editorial in the Buffalo News endorsing the work of the Bank.

ADDRESS BY BARBER B. CONABLE, PRESIDENT, THE WORLD BANK GROUP

Ladies and gentlemen, we are meeting at a time when we are acutely aware that history is in the making. We are meeting at a time when, through cooperative efforts, we can secure social and economic progress here in Eastern Europe of a kind which, only a few months ago, appeared to be an impossible dream.

I have come here to pledge the World Bank's commitment to support the process of reform and development which is underway in Eastern Europe.

I have come here to stress that, as we support East Europe's efforts, so we will support with equal vigor the cause of poverty alleviation and economic growth in all of our traditional borrowing countries.

I have come here to volunteer the World Bank's skills to be a constructive, cooperative partner—to be a coordinating leader—with the governments of East and West Europe, with the Bank's shareholders, and with the full array of international organizations. We must combine our efforts to foster freedom and growth in this part of the world.

And I have come here to sign two loans totalling $360 million— the first by the World Bank to Poland—to underscore the importance which the Bank attaches to the courageous reforms the Polish people and government have undertaken.

Poland's program of reform commands our respect and has earned our support. We are proud to join you in the historic enterprise you have launched. We are confident that the path of reform will lead to a healthier, more efficient economy—one that will provide, in the medium-term, an improved quality of life for the Polish people.

This morning, I will focus my remarks on three broad themes:

First, the challenges which the nations of this region must confront in the coming years;

Second, the World Bank approaches and assistance in support of Eastern Europe; and,

Third, the broader international development concerns which must be considered as Eastern Europe moves ahead.

CENTRAL CHALLENGES

The challenges Poland faces are also common to the other countries of Eastern and Central Europe, despite the unique nature of each of these nations and the diversity which chracterizes this complex region. The international community can, and will, be of assistance, but, ultimately, the peoples and their governments must shoulder the major burden of reform and economic modernization.

As Minister Balcerowicz put it so eloquently when he addressed the World Bank and IMF Annual Meetings in Washington last September:

"The support that we expect is not a substitute for our own efforts. This support is needed to increase the chances for success of our own decisive actions."

Achieving Economic Transformation

To be specific, the first challenge every Eastern European country faces is to provide a better economic and social future for its citizens. To achieve this, nothing short of a transformation of the old economic command system is required. A new system is needed which vests economic decision-making in the individual and in private enterprise.

People need to be empowered. They need to be given genuine economic choices and alternatives. Every citizen must be made to realize that their economic future depends on their individual efforts, as much as the protections the government can provide.

Choice already exists in the political sphere and, increasingly, elsewhere in this region. But for the full promise of social and economic change to be realized, choice must be dramatically extended in economic life as well. Only in this way will the queue and the ration card—all too prevalent—be confined permanently to the trash bin of history. Only in this way will Poland be able to tap its many advantages, such as its educated, skilled and determined people, and its proximity to thriving and newly accessible European markets.

As Edmund Burke put it 200 years ago: "A nation without means of reform is a nation without means of survival." As you strive to transform the old system and to allow economic decision-making and choice to become truly free, you will, necessarily, be effecting great changes in the balance of economic power between the state and the individual.

In Poland and in other countries, the monopoly state enterprise structure—the economic heart of the old system—will need to shed its privileged status. It will have to be drastically restructured to encourage real competition, diversity of asset ownership and private initiative. If this does not change, your bold efforts to stabilize the economy and free prices cannot succeed. Instead, the rigidities of the old system will prevent the movement of labor and capital to more productive uses, and will intensify the twin dangers of prolonged output decline and renewed inflation.

If Eastern European countries are to expand choice and renew growth, they also must reach out to new international partners—for export markets, and for the investment capital, technology and managerial know-how they vitally need.

The first steps toward trade liberalization are already being taken. Much more, though, remains to be done. Western trading partners, too, are making welcome moves to ease restrictions which inhibit convertible currency trade. The Council for Mutual Economic Cooperation (CMEA) is taking the first steps toward the essential drastic overhaul of its structure. These are difficult steps. Our experience in other countries shows, however, that the benefits of more open trade policies are great, and they often begin to flow early in the reform process.

A freer flow of investment capital can also be a powerful stimulus to economic reconstruction and to trade. Foreign investment can help to modernize production—not so much by its financial contribution, but because it brings the vital ingredients of modern technology managerial expertise and access to international markets. The IFC and MIGA—two affiliates of the World Bank which focus on supporting the private sector—can be powerful catalysts here. I believe IFC's participation in your Export Development Bank will demonstrate this.

These changes must be reinforced by laws and institutions which will allow a modern, market-based economy to flourish. Capital and labor must be able to flow easily to where they are most needed and can be most efficiently employed. This requires a capital market and a functioning financial system. It also means changing corporate and labor laws to facilitate the entry and exit of firms, and to strike the right balance between employment security and the needs of the economy.

Poland is already making good headway in many of these areas—reforming the banking system, starting a bond market, freeing private investment, liberalizing joint venture laws, and beginning to subject firms in the socialized sector to tougher budget and credit limits. The World Bank stands ready to work closely with you as you continue to tackle these issues.

Social Protection

The second great challenge confronting Eastern Europe is a social one—to create a new basis for meeting the social needs of the people, both during the immediate adjustment period and in subsequent years. This country is already experiencing the pain of rapidly rising unemployment as it adjusts to economic reality. I strongly endorse the measures the government is taking to protect the most vulnerable in society. In forthcoming operations, World Bank staff will seek ways to provide financial and technical assistance to help Poland deal with unemployment and other social costs of the transformation.

Beyond such emergency measures, the alarming decline in the standard of health in all Eastern European countries must be arrested, education must be modernized, and well-targeted, adequate and financially viable unemployment insurance, pension and social security systems must be set in place.

And, as we all are aware, something must be done about housing. Polish citizens should not have to wait 15 years for an apartment. Despite huge housing subsidies, there are over half a million unfinished housing units in Poland—two-thirds of them in the private sector—and the completion rate has been dropping. As a matter of priority, these houses must be completed, especially the 160,000 in the state sector which has most immediate access to supplies and financing. If the housing market can be progressively freed to reflect the value people place on decent accommodation, I am confident that rapid progress can be made in private sector construction and in rehabilitation as well. The Bank has been working closely with Poland on housing reform, and we are prepared to provide further assistance in this priority area.

The Environmental Challenge

The third great challenge, of which everyone is acutely aware, is the environment. With dying rivers and poisoned industrial cities, Eastern Europe contains some of the most polluted regions on earth. The hazard to people's health and to future growth—in Cracow, in Katowice, and in many cities throughout Eastern Europe—is grave and immediate. Economic progress is a Phyrric victory for those who cannot breathe, or drink the water, or avoid toxic assaults on their physical well-being.

In short, action on the environmental front cannot be postponed to some future date when the economic crisis has been overcome. To quote the French "father of ecology", Rene Dubos, "Man shapes himself through decisions that shape his environment."

Action on the environment must be part and parcel of the process of reform. Economic incentives, new investment, legislation enforcement and public education must combine to pull Poland and other countries back from the brink of environmental disaster.

The World Bank is making a major commitment to its European borrowers in this effort. We are financing the cleaning of rivers and coastal waters in Yugoslavia. We are working with Hungary on a national environmental strategy—of which the Danube waters issue is a key part. We are working with donors in Western Europe to clean Mediterranean waters.

The forthcoming environmental management project in Poland, which we plan to support, will be just the beginning of our effort to assist you in meeting this important challenge. The project will help Poland make environmental improvement an integral part of its economic reform program. The aim of this operation is to ensure that assessment of environmental costs and benefits is built into the process of restructuring industry. In addition, its goal is to ensure that a sound framework exists to guide the major investments in Polish environmental rehabilitation which the government will undertake—with the help of the international community.

In further loans, the World Bank hopes to help Poland develop sustainable technologies, and introduce incentives for much greater energy efficiency and conservation—a critical step to improve the environment.

We must not delude ourselves. Meeting these three fundamental challenges—economic transformation, social protection and environmental clean-up—will require sustained long-term effort. Dismantling the command system, creating a robust financial system, modernizing industry and fostering the emergence of a strong private sector will take years. Re-training millions of workers and establishing a properly financed social protection system is a massive task. Winning back clean air for Eastern Europe's cities and flushing the poison from its rivers is a huge undertaking. But every long journey begins with first steps. The first steps in meeting these challenges must be taken now.

I, however, am an optimist. The American humorist, Mark Twain, describes an optimist as one "who thinks things can't get any worse." I'm the kind of optimist who believes things are going to get better—if Eastern Europe persists in its courageous course. With strong spirit and determination in support of reform, you can count on the World Bank in the tough times ahead, not just in the first euphoric moments of change.

EXPANDED WORLD BANK PROGRAM

This leads me to the second theme of my speech: What the Bank proposes to do to assist Poland and its other member countries in Eastern and Central Europe.

Events are moving so fast that they demand forceful and swift responses by agencies like the World Bank. I assure you that we will be swift, and we will be flexible. We recognize the great differences in political and economic conditions in each of the countries of Eastern Europe, the differences in traditions and cultures and experiences. Our work will be carefully tailored to respect the uniqueness of each nation.

We do not come here with a crisp and simplistic reform recipe for all of Eastern Europe. We come instead with the awareness that to be a useful partner we must be extremely sensitive to the individuality of each sovereign state within Eastern Europe.

What specifically can you expect from the World Bank?

First, we are expanding our capacity on the ground. Poland is a pioneer in this respect. At the invitation of the government, an important World Bank Resident Mission will be operational in Warsaw within three months. We have worldwide experience to share, and the Mission's professional staff will be available to provide close consultation and technical assistance to Polish decision-makers. It will have the authority to respond flexibly, quickly and innovatively to government requests for help.

Second, we are expanding our program of policy advice and technical work, and our effort in research and training directly relevant to the problems facing Poland. This expansion is designed to meet the specific needs of individual Eastern European countries—including countries which we expect will become active members soon. The new program will deepen our comparative understanding of reform problems.

We will ensure that the fruits of this work will be swiftly available to the reformers—through our resident offices and technical assistance programs, through our continuing dialogue with member governments, and through bigger training and outreach activities by the Bank's Economic Development Institute [EDI].

Third, we are prepared to expand financial assistance from the World Bank Group. I anticipate that the Bank will lend over $5 billion to our current Eastern European borrowers over the next three years—up to $2.5 billion for Poland. Lending to other new members would follow, as and when they join and it is determined that they are eligible for Bank assistance.

IFC is already an active partner in Eastern Europe, and has a major role to play in the development of private sector investment, both foreign and domestic. Our Multilateral Investment Guarantee Agency (MIGA) will be active, as well, as guarantor and promoter of more private foreign investment.

Our lending will focus on restructuring all facets of the economy and market-oriented change. We will seek to provide financial support for economy-wide policy reforms through structural adjustment lending. We will help to finance the transformation of industry and banking—to modernize and expand infrastructure, to support environmental rehabilitation, and to help restructure the social sectors—through well-targeted sector and investment operations.

Creditworthiness is a sine qua non for World Bank lending. Restructuring of the Polish debt, thus, is vital for our involvement and a responsibility for Poland and the international community. We will work with you toward a better structure and management of external debt, and use our own resources wherever possible to help secure co-financing from other public and private sources.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT CONCERNS

In conclusion, I wish to place the grand events in this part of the world within a broad international setting. The World Bank has 152 member countries. It is an agency concerned with the alleviation of poverty and has a global mandate. It is a partner with many diverse organizations in the quest for greater economic stability and growth. It has long been a cooperative forum in a world of conflict and controversy.

We are expanding our role in Eastern Europe precisely because of our worldwide responsibilities and experience—and because Eastern Europe's agenda of change, growth and expanded human opportunity makes a compelling claim on our resources.

I am pleased that the Polish government shares this broad vision of development. Despite its own severe financial constraints, Poland has demonstrated its commitment to the worldwide battle against poverty through its membership in, and financial contribution to, the International Development Agency. IDA is the Bank's concessional financing affiliate which helps development efforts in the poorest countries. Poland's contribution to IDA is all the more noteworthy, since IDA is a financial source from which it cannot draw.

In these momentous times in Europe, the international community cannot neglect its pressing obligations elsewhere. It must be responsive to Eastern Europe, but assistance to Eastern Europe should be additional so as not to come at the expense of assistance to other—and poorer—parts of the Third World. We cannot ignore the need to turn around Africa's catastrophic decline and to bring hope and better lives to Asia's hundreds of millions of desperately poor people. We cannot ignore the special problems of the heavily indebted countries in Latin America and elsewhere.

None of the World Bank's financial support for Eastern European countries will come at the expense of poorer countries—or at the expense of any of our borrowers. No country in this part of the world qualifies to receive IDA's concessional funding. And, expanded lending of IBRD funds in Eastern Europe will not crowd out any of our other borrowers, thanks to the Bank's strong capital position and access to funds.

In this context, all of us hope that the momentous changes taking place in international relations will lead to significant reductions in the $600 billion currently spent worldwide each year for military purposes. Against such a magnitude of expenditure, the additional sums needed to avoid diversion of assistance from one needy region to another are miniscule.

Let a peace dividend work for all nations, and especially for those in this part of the world where reduced tensions should permit the redirection of arms expenditures to the major task of reconstruction. Like His Holiness, Pope John Paul II, all governments should ask the question: "Are the children to receive the arms race as a necessary inheritance?"

While Eastern Europe and Poland can count on the World Bank, neither we nor anyone else has the insights and resources to meet all of Eastern Europe's needs. The international community must work together to build networks of effective support. Through these networks, we all can learn from emerging experience and combine our efforts efficiently.

To make sure this happens, the World Bank plans to develop even stronger ties with the European Community, with the new European Bank for Reconstruction and Development, with the OECD and with the UN system. We will also continue to work in close partnership with our sister institution, the International Monetary Fund, here in Poland and in other countries.

The Bank will put its experience and its Eastern European program—including our new Resident Mission in Warsaw—at the service of this vital international cooperative effort. Together, we can reverse the economic decline and environmental degradation which feed on each other to produce social injustice and disintegration. Together, we can put in place systems which reinforce equitable growth and a rehabilitated environment to produce a better quality of life for this and future Polish generations.

You have our firm commitment, and that is the true significance of the first loans to Poland which Minister Balcerowicz and I have signed today.

Conclusion

Ladies and gentleman: We have learned from the events of recent months that the unexpected can happen, and with breathtaking speed. I have come to Warsaw to listen and to learn, to support the process of reform, and to pledge the World Bank's assistance to the cause of development, so that all East Europeans may look to the 21st century with real hopes of a new age of dignity and prosperity.

The great historian, Thucydides, wrote:

"The bravest are surely those who have the clearest vision of what is before them—glory and danger alike—and yet notwithstanding go out to meet it."

I believe future historians will record that the Polish peoples' struggle for a brighter future ranked them among the bravest of the brave.

[From the Buffalo News, Apr. 4, 1990]

A GOOD BANK TO INVEST IN—WORLD BANK'S PAYOFF: PEACE, GROWTH, STABILITY

Much foreign aid has been frittered away in the past, but that is not true in the economic development programs administered by the World Bank, which carefully evaluates economic projects before approving loans. Very few nations have fallen behind in repaying the loans—with interest.

Barber Conable, the former Western New York congressman who now is president of the 152-member World Bank, reports that it has actually earned more than $1 billion a year for the past three years. These earnings are plowed back into new loans.

Now before Congress is the Bush administration's budget request to pay for the U.S. share of the financing of the World Bank and its affiliates for the coming year.

With historic development opportunities now opening up in newly freed Eastern Europe, the World Bank is poised to play a major role in reshaping Eastern Europe, as it helped to rebuild Western Europe after World War II.

World Bank loans are made only if projects are economically sound, and under Conable there has been increasing stress on encouraging free enterprise, as opposed to the impractical, Marxist-oriented projects many underdeveloped nations once favored.

Included in the budget request for the World Bank are additional funds for an affiliate, the International Development Association, which is the world's key organization for assisting the poorest countries. To qualify for IDA loans, a nation must have a per capita income of $580 or less a year. Most recipients register less than $400.

While these loans are long-term and pay the IDA no interest except for a service charge, they are approved under the same tough criteria as regular World Bank loans. Even some of these poor countries have begun repaying.

The U.S. share of the new IDA funds is about $1 billion a year for three years, or 21.6 percent of the total amount contributed by 34 donor nations. This is a highly cost-efficient means of assisting countries, such as India and Pakistan, in which the United States has an interest.

At the economic summit in Paris last July, President Bush urged the multilateral development agencies to put more emphasis on the environment. The World Bank is now stressing more stringent environmental provisions in its projects as well as new incentives for economic performance.

A third objective is reduction of poverty and improvement of quality of life. Conable explained that "to be sustainable, development has to be based on health, literacy, productivity." He also stressed the need for greater efforts to control population growth.

The importance of sending foreign aid to Eastern Europe is obvious in terms of peace, stability and new economic opportunities.

But the underdeveloped world could also be a good economic investment as it develops as a market. Congress should approve the World Bank appropriation.

TRIBUTE TO VIANNEY HIGH SCHOOL ON THE OCCASION OF ITS 30TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. JACK BUECHNER

OF MISSOURI

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. BUECHNER. Mr. Speaker, there has been a great deal of attention focused on our educational system in recent years, and we have seen much debate as to what course education should take in years to come. Thus, it seems particularly fitting that on May 6, 1990, St. John Vianney High School in Kirkwood, MO, will celebrate its 30th year of commitment to excellence of every sort; it is with great pleasure that I rise today in tribute to Vianney on its 30th anniversary.

St. John Vianney is a Catholic, all-boys, college preparatory school which was founded and is operated by the Society of Mary. Its academic credentials are noted throughout the St. Louis area, and the Vianney Golden Griffins are respected not only on the athletic field, particularly in soccer, football, and hockey, but also in such intellectual challenges as chess, drama, and music. After 30 years, the school has developed a noteworthy physical facility with its impressive stadium, gymnasiums, and auditorium, among other things. Now, after a successful fundraising campaign, Vianney's future has never been brighter. But while all of these attributes are commendable, they are not what makes Vianney unique.

A school is more than classrooms, gyms, and academic and athletic accomplishment. There is, in most schools, a sense of purpose and a sense of community which define the institution far better than anything that can be described in a brochure. The Marianist Brothers' commitment to shaping boys into men, the desire of the students to excel, the religious principles upon which the school is based; these are the things that set Vianney apart. At the risk of using an overused term, Vianney's most outstanding characteristic is the school's spirit.

Both of my sons were fortunate enough to have worn the black and gold and graduated from Vianney in the past few years. In watching their progress, their experience, and their strong feelings for the school, I came to understand Vianney and its mission, which is, quite simply, to turn boys into educated, successful young men.

Mr. Speaker, Vianney is just beginning to educate its second generation of students—a gift beyond value to the St. Louis area. I am confident that through the next 30 years Vianney will remain true to the principles and traditions that have guided it so successfully since its inception. I ask this assembly to join me today in saluting Vianney High School for 30 years of educational excellence. To all the Golden Griffins, past and present, soar high, reflect the values you were taught, and always be, as the song says, "true to your school."

PEACE CORPS REVIVAL

HON. GEO. W. CROCKETT, JR.

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. CROCKETT. Mr. Speaker, one of the best pieces of news I have heard recently concerns the revival of the Peace Corps.

Few good ideas have had to suffer more indignities. The Peace Corps has survived attempts to make it an adjunct of our technical assistance programs, to bury it in domestic agencies and, most recently, the neglect of what Washington Post columnist David Broder refers to as "the reigning Reaganites [who] thought of Wall Street as a better venue for youthful ambition." But, as Broder points out, the Peace Corps is making a comeback. The budget is up, recruitment is up, and the Peace Corps is looking forward to the new challenges of the 1990's and beyond.

I know my colleagues will continue their strong support for this fine organization, and I include Mr. Broder's column at this point.

[From the Washington Post, Mar. 25, 1990]

PEACE CORPS REVIVAL

Paul Coverdell gets approximately one-thousandth the publicity and attention Dick Cheney receives. The budget he manages has about the same relationship to that of Cheney's Defense Department.

But Coverdell is not fretting, for his agency is unlike Cheney's in another respect. As much as Congress wants to cut the Pentagon, it seems eager to increase the Peace Corps, which Coverdell heads.

No mystery why. As Coverdell told the House Foreign Affairs Committee, "In many ways, it is as if the Peace Corps has been in training for this historical moment." With democracy and freedom breaking out around the globe, the demand for Peace Corps volunteers is soaring. And eager legislators keep pressing Coverdell with offers of help.

John F. Kennedy's project for sending American volunteers to work with people in poor countries went into deep decline during the '80s, when the reigning Reaganites thought of Wall Street as a better venue for youthful ambition. The Peace Corps struggled to stay alive, with then-vice president Bush offering backstage support to the political ally, Loret Miller Ruppe, whom he had persuaded President Reagan to name as Peace Corps director.

Coverdell, an Atlanta businessman and former Republican legislator, is also a longtime Bush backer. He was, in fact, the first person outside Texas or the Bush family I ever heard talk seriously, back in the '70s, of wanting to see Bush become president.

That Bush would place a man with Coverdell's political credentials and managerial ability at the head of the Peace Corps speaks volumes about his commitment to the agency. He's backed it up with bucks. The $16 million budget increase Bush proposed for fiscal 1991 (to $181 million) is the biggest year-to-year jump the Peace Corps has received in more than 25 years.

It will be needed. Twenty-six additional countries have requested Peace Corps volunteers, and Coverdell is planning to service 15 of them in the next two years. In 18 months, the Peace Corps will expand its range of countries as much as it did in the preceding 20 years.

Poland and Hungary head the list of Eastern European countries that will receive Peace Corps volunteers. But Coverdell is determined not to ignore the nations of Africa, Asia and Latin America. Uganda, Namibia, the Ivory Coast, Chile, Panama and Uruguay are all priorities.

That's where the money is needed. It costs $1 million in overhead to open up a country program and about $29,000 annually to support each volunteer. Unlike other agencies, the Peace Corps has plenty of enthusiastic friends in Congress. Many senators and representatives have learned from their own overseas travels that the volunteers are not only the largest American presence in many countries but the best-loved.

While pushing his slim staff to deal with the challenges of rapid expansion, Coverdell is also trying to reshape its focus—in ways that reflect his own background as well as the changing world. As an urban businessman with a long history of environmental advocacy, the new director is steering more of his programs to burgeoning Third World cities, placing volunteers in social service, environmental and small-business development projects.

"We are maintaining our traditional interest in agriculture, health and education," Coverdell told me. Indeed, the first contingent of volunteers for Poland will be English teachers. "But as we expand our programs, we are going to emphasize urban development, small-business development and environmental action, as so many of those countries wish."

The Peace Corps has never been a massive effort and probably never should be. Its greatest impact lies in the personal interaction between a helping American and the people she or he is inspiring and assisting. In his long-term planning, Coverdell estimates that all foreseeable requests could be satisfied by a Peace Corps with 12,000 volunteers.

The Bush budget aims at adding 1,000 volunteers to the Peace Corps by 1992, taking it up to 7,300, and Coverdell envisages the 12,000 figure by the end of the decade. Some congressional Democrats would like to expand faster. But without creating a cumbersome Washington bureaucracy, there are practical limits on how fast it can grow.

Finding volunteers is not a problem. More than 14,000 applied last year for the 3,200 training slots that were open. Minorities (7 percent) are scarcer than Coverdell and others would like. Rep. Connie Morella (R-Md.) has a bill that would give ROTC-like college subsidies to minority students and others with needed skills in return for two or three years of post-graduation Peace Corps service.

Already, 60 percent of the Peace Corps volunteers have identifiable skills of importance to their hosts. One volunteer out of eight is over 55, and many of those seniors bring years of experience to their tasks.

Peace Corps is no longer a new idea. But old ideas that are sound can gain renewed energy from strong leadership and presidential sponsorship. That's what's happening with the Peace Corps now.

U.S. FINANCIAL COMPETITIVENESS

HON. JOHN J. LaFALCE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. LaFALCE. Mr. Speaker, in the following remarks given by Mr. Hans Angermueller, formerly of Citibank, at a recent conference in New York on the restructuring of the banking industry, Mr. Angermueller makes two very fundamental and compelling points. First, the position of the United States in the new world order that is emerging will be a function of its economic strength, rather than its military might. Second, the competitive disadvantages facing U.S. financial institutions constitute a fundamental threat to that economic strength, and may adversely affect our economic well-being.

I concur with Mr. Angermueller's conclusion that we must move quickly to reform the structure of our financial services industry, and I commend his remarks to the attention of my colleagues.

WILL THE U.S. BANKING INDUSTRY REMAIN COMPETITIVE IN THE GLOBAL MARKETPLACE?—CONCERNS OF AN EX-BANKER

(Remarks by Hans H. Angermueller)

My thesis is quite simple and, if you are an American, quite disturbing. In a world order which is more and more becoming based on economic, and not military might, the efficiency with which a nation's financial institutions can facilitate the flow of capital from the ultimate suppliers to the ultimate users of capital will be a major factor in determining that nation's economic well being and its position in the global marketplace.

In my view, foreign financial institutions are today much better positioned than U.S. financial institutions to mobilize capital and help direct it to its most productive uses. Foreign financial institutions have the flexibility to respond to changes in the marketplace. U.S. financial firms do not.

Foreign financial institutions have the opportunity to diversify and to tap new sources of revenue. U.S. financial institutions do not.

Foreign financial institutions can therefore expect to be stronger and more competitive than U.S. institutions. Consequently in today's global marketplace, U.S. institutions operate at a disadvantage not only in the international markets, but in the United States as well.

This is bad news not only for U.S. financial institutions, but given the pivotal role that financial institutions play, there will be adverse consequences for the U.S. economy.

For almost half a century, the military confrontation between the U.S. and the Soviet Union has led to their respective roles as the world's superpowers. However, it is now becoming increasingly clear that the world leadership role of the U.S. can no longer be based on its rivalry with the Soviet Union. The U.S. must adjust its priorities in a world in which other nations aggressively pursue their own economic interests and are becoming less dependent on U.S. military strength. This means that the U.S. must position itself to remain competitive in the global marketplace which, in turn, means that U.S. financial institutions must be able to operate effectively in that marketplace.

However, that marketplace is undergoing fundamental and irrevocable changes. Today, as we are all aware, major advances in information technology, shifts in savings from depositories to mutual funds and pension funds and the use of options, futures, swaps and other derivative instruments are revolutionizing the business of finance.

As a result, financial institutions can now disassemble any financial asset into its basic risk components and recombine those basic components into a new instrument with completely different maturity, liquidity, interest-rate, foreign exchange and credit characteristics. This enables the users and the suppliers of capital, including intermediaries themselves, to determine how much, and what kind of, risk they wish to bear.

Accordingly, instead of traditional intermediation by banks and insurance companies on the one hand and securities distribution and trading by investment bankers on the other hand, we are moving toward a world of financial engineering and administration—all provided in a highly integrated global marketplace peopled by new investors using new techniques.

What has been the reaction to these basic and continuing changes in the world of finance?

Most OECD countries are in the process of taking, or have already taken, the steps necessary to permit financial institutions in their countries the opportunity to adapt to this changing financial marketplace. They are doing this by permitting their financial institutions to exercise a broad range of powers and thus to offer their customers whatever combination of products and services they may demand and which the institutions feel competent to provide.

These countries are developing a regulatory climate that is hospitable to a global financial services business. The premier example is the U.K. But other countries are also streamlining their financial systems for defensive reasons—to prevent any further erosion of their position. All of them are doing so because it makes good economic sense—they know that job creation, physical investment, and the efficient allocation of scarce capital are all at stake.

In preparation for 1992, countries within the European Community are rapidly dismantling the remaining barriers between banking, securities, and insurance. In a blunt report on where European banking is headed, Sir Leon Brittain, Vice-President of the Commission of the European Communities, recently told a Washington audience that the European Community "in one bound, * * * has moved from twelve fragmented and confusing structures of national (banking) regulation to a single market of a size and simplicity unmatched anywhere else in the world." He took pains to point out that the EC is not taking these steps "merely to benefit banks * * * We are doing it to increase the competitiveness of European industry by giving it access to the cheapest, most efficient, and most innovative financial products in the world. * * * So don't say you weren't warned!"

With incentives like this, the Japanese Ministry of Finance is speeding up the process of exploring options for the future of Japan's financial system. The betting is that Japan will move toward some form of universal banking system soon.

In sum, public policy toward the financial sector in other parts of the developed world is changing rapidly and, from the point of view of their financial institutions and their customers, it seems to be changing for the better.

The result is that today, by and large, foreign banks are better capitalized, more flexible, more responsive, and better rated than are the major U.S. banks. And this has resulted in the markets valuing their shares much higher than those of U.S. banks. That permits them to raise new capital on much more attractive terms which, in turn, facilitates their ability to grow, to acquire, and to compete in the key markets around the world. For example, foreign banks hold more than 25% of the total assets of the U.S. banking system. U.S. banks hold no way near this percentage of assets in any foreign banking system.

What, in contrast, has been happening within the U.S. in response to the basic changes in the world of finance? The short answer is, at best, "basically nothing".

Without a major restructuring of our laws and regulations, I am afraid that U.S. financial institutions will be relegated to playing bit parts on the world financial services stage. Handicapped by a weak domestic franchise, U.S. financial institutions generally, and U.S. banks in particular, face a narrower range of options than do foreign institutions. U.S. banks may withdraw into the United States. Indeed, many U.S. banks have already cut back substantially on their operations overseas. Others may retain a global presence, but only in selected markets or for selected groups of customers. Still others may find it necessary to find a foreign partner or seek adoption by a foreign parent.

Unfortunately, continued Congressional inaction and preoccupation about the federal safety net actually threaten to make matters worse. It is conceivable that further rhetoric about the federal safety net with no action will turn U.S. depository institutions into quasi-public utilities that will serve as the repositories of the nation's junk credits. It is noteworthy that U.S. commercial bank write-offs (excluding LDC reserves) in the last five years were $60 billion. That is more than twice as much as the write-offs during all of the 1950s, 1960s and the 1970s!

Indeed, I see U.S. banks frantically competing within their limited domestic sectors; assuming ever greater risks for ever smaller rewards simply to stay on the top of the league tables; granting their "star" employees extraordinary compensation even when performance has been mediocre or poor; and, at the same time, cutting back on less heralded employees to show some measure of profit. One wonders whether the U.S. economy, in which today 35 large bank holding companies hold about one-half of all U.S. banking assets, really needs all of the 13,000 banks plus 3,000 thrifts that we have. Perhaps a smaller number of larger institutions operating in a national market with greater flexibility and less constraint might be better for the public interest—even though perhaps not for the special interests.

Bad as this picture of U.S. banking may be, it could even get worse, for I see some disturbing parallels between the banking crisis of 1933 and the thrift crisis of 1990.

In 1933, the Congress believed that the securities activities of banks were largely responsible for the stock market boom and bust and contributed to the high rate of bank failures. It did not matter that there was absolutely no evidence to demonstrate that this was true. Everyone acted as if it was. Now, more than 50 years later, it is widely acknowledged that the banks that failed in the 1930s failed primarily because they were small and undiversified in their activities and assets. These small banks were particularly hit hard by the government's restrictive monetary policy which was largely to blame for turning the recession of 1929 into the Great Depression. Just as they needed liquidity, there was none around.

Hopefully, it will not take another 50 years to understand why thousands of thrifts have failed and why it will cost the U.S. taxpayer more than $300—some now say up to $500-Billion to resolve the problem. In my view, the real villain—as Pogo suggested in his deathless quote "the enemy is us"—is the government itself.

The government allowed hundreds of thrift institutions to continue in operation long after they were insolvent. When these insolvent institutions had exhausted their own capital, they were permitted to continue to raise money from the public by soliciting above market rate insured deposits. With none of their own funds at stake, they had every incentive literally "to bet the bank".

Think for a moment how quickly the thrift crisis could have been averted or brought under control if the Federal authorities had simply refused to extend deposit insurance to cover any new deposits of thrifts whose capital levels were below minimum requirements.

This, however, only explains how the situation was allowed to deteriorate. It does not explain how the thrifts got into so much trouble in the first place.

The origins of the thrift crisis can also be traced to government action. To support the housing industry thrifts were confined to making long-term fixed rate mortgages financed by short-term deposits. In effect, the thrift charter amounted to a license to bet on interest rates. As long as interest rates were relatively stable and the yield curve was positive, these bets paid off. But as interest rates became volatile and the yield curve flipped, the situation changed. After a decade of stop and go monetary policy and spiraling inflation, the Federal Reserve in October 1979 abruptly shifted gears. The result was that in 1980-81, as the Fed caused interest rates went through the roof, the thrift industry went through the floor.

At the same time, the forces that were revolutionizing the financial services industry—the advances in information technology, the institutionalization of savings and the development of new financial instruments—were undermining the unique preferential relationship between thrift institutions and residential finance. The traditional package of thrift services—the origination, the servicing and the funding of home mortgages was becoming unbundled and other firms began to offer one or another of these services. Commercial and mortgage bankers got into the business of making mortgage loans in a big way. Investment bankers packaged pools of mortgages into mortgage backed securities and sold them to the new investors. Competition intensified and large numbers of thrifts struggled to survive.

In response to the higher interest rates and new competitive environment, the Congress first lifted the ceilings on interest rates payable on deposits and broadened the powers that thrifts could exercise. At the same time, thrift supervision and examination staffs were slashed and Congress authorized the regulatory agencies to relax capital standards and to paper over capital deficiencies. So-called new worth certificates and other Mickey Mouse accounting devices were introduced to make the easing of thrift capital requirements look good.

In sum, the thrift crisis was a consequence of the collision of the narrow thrift charter in a competitive world with an abrupt shift in monetary policy. That collision was exacerbated by lax regulation and supervision and compounded by the inability of the FSLIC to close down insolvent institutions.

My fear is that just as the Congress in 1933 found the banks guilty of crimes that they did not commit, so now the Congress will blame broader powers, rather than government policies for the thrift mess. The Congress, which in 1989 under FIRREA has already reimposed activity restrictions on thrifts, may attempt to limit the scope of activities that can be conducted by banks, since both enjoy the benefits of the federal safety net.

In other words, what I am afraid of is that the Congress will come up with a 1990s version of the Banking Act of 1933.

This then brings me to my last subject—what should the Congress do?

As I indicated earlier, the world of finance is in the process of fundamental change. The securitization of financial assets, the globalization of financial markets, and the integration of financial functions are the symbols of that change. And, in that world of change, foreign financial institutions are getting stronger and U.S. financial institutions are getting weaker.

Congress can, as it did in 1933, once again punish U.S. banks for the disastrous consequences of poor public policy. Or Congress can acknowledge the threat facing U.S. financial institutions and enact the kind of structural reform that will permit our financial institutions to compete with each other on equal terms in the United States and with foreign competitors in the global marketplace.

Obviously, I urge the latter course for this time we will not have the luxury of 50 or 60 years for the consequences of Congressional action or inaction to become apparent. In 1933, the world economy was depressed; international trade was at standstill; commercial and financial markets were segmented; and communications were poor. Today, the world economy is growing; international trade is flourishing; commercial and financial markets are integrated; and communications are daily improving. Today, the results of Congressional action or inaction will have immediate consequences—for better or for worse.

It seems to me that Congress must deal with two fundamental issues, deposit insurance reform and structural reform. Whether the issues are dealt with successively or concurrently, the fact is that both issues be addressed and soon. Both, not just one. Deposit insurance reform should be designed to protect the deposit insurance funds and to assure that the U.S. taxpayer is not once again exposed to risk. However, deposit insurance reform, by itself, will do nothing to assure that financial firms will remain competitive and able to generate earnings sufficient to maintain adequate capital. That ability, to generate earnings that maintain and attract capital, is ultimately the best protection for the deposit insurance funds and for the U.S. taxpayer.

There is thus an obvious connection between a strong and healthy depository industry and a solvent deposit insurance system. But structural reform and deposit insurance reform are two distinct issues, and it would be a mistake for Congress to link the two together. Structural reform cannot solve the problems of a federal deposit insurance system that covers all deposits of all depository institutions however poorly or well they are run.

This is not to say that concerns over the extension of the federal safety net are not legitimate. But they should not be addressed through an interlocking web of prohibitions and restrictions, which would largely negate, if not destroy, any benefits of structural reform. Instead, the problems with the deposit insurance system must be confronted and solved directly and independently.

There are a number of ideas as to how to accomplish this. There are proposals to limit coverage to one account per institution; to roll back coverage from its current $100,000 level; to share risk within that coverage; to offer the consumer a choice of low-yield insured deposits or higher yield non-insured deposits; to subject deposits above $100,000 to market risks; to fix "haircuts" on large deposits; to introduce private insurance.

Similarly, the problems with structural reform must be confronted and solved directly and independently. Here too there are a variety of proposals by trade associations such as the ABHC, the FSC and the BCMA as well as by regulators. All warrant consideration. Some have already been introduced in the Congress in legislative form.

Thus, after nearly two decades of debate, reams of Congressional testimony, countless conferences and hundreds, if not thousands of academic papers and studies, the ideas are all here. But where is the political will to implement them?

I began my remarks by pointing out that national rivalries will increasingly be played out on economic, as opposed to military, battlefields. Europe, in the person of Sir Leon Brittain, has warned us to how it intends to conduct the economic battle insofar as financial services is concerned. Will the U.S. Congress rise to this economic challenge of the 1990s as it did to the military challenge of the 1950s?

BILL OF RIGHTS IN ACTION AWARD TO ALAN ROTHENBERG

HON. MEL LEVINE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Speaker, each year the Constitutional Rights Foundation presents its coveted Bill of Rights in Action Award to a person who provides an exemplary model of citizenship for our Nation's youth. I would like to join with the community in honoring Alan I. Rothenberg at the 28th annual spring dinner on May 7, 1990.

Throughout his life, Alan I. Rothenberg has displayed dynamic leadership in all of the professional, community and personal endeavors which he has undertaken. In his work he has energetically upheld the ideals manifested in our Bill of Rights, in both the practice and teaching of law. Mr. Rothenberg has also shown great commitment to nonprofit and community organizations through his work with the Los Angeles County Music Center, the Olympic Organizing Committee, the Museum of Science and Industry Foundation, the Museum of Contemporary Art and Sinai Temple.

Alan Rothenberg is a senior partner in the law firm of Manatt, Phelps, Rothenberg & Phillips and is currently president of the State Bar of California. Active in innumerable civic, charitable and political activities, the diversity of Mr. Rothenberg's interests is broad. In addition to serving on the board of directors of a number of nonprofit organizations, he is also the immediate past president of the Los Angeles Clippers basketball team of the NBA and is presently a television commentator on "Sportslook" on ESPN.

Throughout all his endeavors, Alan Rothenberg has enjoyed the support and love of his wife, Georgina Lee and their three sons, Brad, Richard and Dan. He has been an articulate and loyal spokesman for the educational programs of the Constitutional Rights Foundation and served as the foundations' president from 1987–89. TRIBUTE TO JOHN P. MAHAN OF LEOMINSTER, MA

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. NEAL of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, it is my honor today to use this opportuntiy to pay tribute to a fine public servant in my district; City Councilor John P. Mahan. We all know of hardworking men and women that take the time to contribute to their community and John P. Mahan is one of the finest such people in Leominster, MA.

John P. Mahan has served for 25 years on the Leominster City Council. This year, for the fifth time, John is the president of the council. All of the members of the council has signed a city resolution honoring John for these many years of service. As a former city councilor myself, I know how difficult and often thankless this service can be. Leominster has seen good times and difficult struggles over the past quarter century, and John Mahan has been there working to improve his community. He has served as both the ward four councilor and, more recently, as councilor at large. John is known for bringing the personal touch to his work and his home phone is always ringing. Without public servants like John Mahon our communities could not function.

Mr. Speaker, in addition to his public service, John Mahon has been a valuable member of the Leominster community. He has been involved with the Little League, the PTA, and many other community service organizations. He is also known for his impressive baseball card collection. John Mahan is also known as a dedicated family man, married 29 years to his wife, Ann. My congratulation to John, Ann, and their children; Brenda, Jordan, Jr., and Michael. I salute John P. Mahan for his fine record of public service and wish him the best of luck in the future.

A TRIBUTE TO DONALD E. SCHULTZE

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, today I rise to pay tribute to a man who has lived a life of singular service to his community. Donald E. Schultze has lived in the city of Hawaiian Gardens for close to three decades. With his wife, Betty, he has raised six children, Donna, Steven, Karen, David, Kenneth, and Mary.

In addition to this remarkable achievement, he has found the time not only to be successful in running his own contracting business and in raising a family, but to lead his community as well. As the former mayor of Hawaiian Gardens, Donald was not content with one full time job, and somehow found the time to also serve on the board of directors of the Los Angeles County Sanitation District No. 19, and on the special events committee of the California Contract Cities Association.

He has helped shape the future of his city through his service on the Los Angeles County commissioner community and planning commission advisory boards. Working diligencly to improve every facet of community life, he also served on the district attorney's advisory board and received a distinguished service award from the Los Angeles County Sheriff's Department for his efforts to assist local law enforcement. In addition, this man has served a term as president of the Cancer Awarness Foundation, and has received numerous awards from civic and charity organizations including the Killingsworth Junior High PTA and the California Parks and Recreation Society.

Donald has lived a life devoted to his family, his community in Hawaiian Gardens, and his country. My wife, Lee, joins me in recognizing his extraordinary legacy of service and achievements.

NATIONAL HUMANITIES WEEK

HON. MARY ROSE OAKAR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to introduce today, in concert with Senator PAUL SIMON, a resolution declaring October 21 to 27, 1990, as National Humanities Week. I would also like to thank Congressman PAUL HENRY for joining me as an original cosponsor of this resolution.

As you may recall, Congress approved a similar resolution designating a week in February 1986 as National Humanities Week. This resolution honored the National Endowment for the Humanities on its 20th anniversary. It is only fitting that on the 25th anniversary of the Endowment, we honor and recognize the institution in the same way.

In order to promote progress and scholarship in the humanities and the arts in the United States, Congress enacted the National Foundation on the Arts and Humanities Act of 1965. This act established the National Endowment for the Humanities as an independent, grantmaking agency of the Federal Government to support research, education, and public programs in the humanities.

In the act that established the National Endowment for the Humanities, the term "humanities" includes the study of these disciplines: History; philosophy; languages; linguistics; literature; archaeology; the history, theory, and criticism of the arts; comparative religion; and aspects of the social sciences that employ historical or philosophical approaches.

A recent National Endowment for the Humanities study found that two-thirds of 17-year-old Americans did not know when the American Civil War occurred. An understanding of history is essential if we are to understand and direct the present and plan for the future.

Mr. Speaker, the study of the humanities increases our understanding of past traditions and civilizations. The humanities break down the barriers of isolation and allow individuals to communicate regardless of differences in race, gender, or family experience.

Mr. Speaker, the State humanities councils are the bridge to the people from the National Endowment. They provide the resources and the inspiration for Americans to expand their understanding of human experience. Their record of partnership between Federal, State, and local government entities, universities, colleges, businesses, teachers, scholars, and individuals is one to be commended.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to join me in support of National Humanities Week. This week will provide the background for a national focus on the importance of the humanities.

INTRODUCTION OF THE AGRICULTURAL RESOURCES CONSERVATION ACT OF 1990

HON. E de la GARZA

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, our Nation's farmers and ranchers are stewards of much of our country's valuable natural resources. Fertile topsoil and adequate, clean water are the farmer's most precious assets. These natural resources and the efficiency of U.S. agriculture have enabled Americans to a safe, abundant and affordable food supply that is the envy of the world.

As Congress develops the 1990 farm bill, we are faced with the challenge of properly balancing two policy objectives—to maintain the economic health of agriculture and to better protect our natural resources. This challenge calls for initiatives that will improve the environmental framework of agricultural policy and allow farmers to continue being efficient producers of food and fiber.

I have introduced H.R. 4713, the Agricultural Resources Conservation [ARC] Act of 1990, to meet this challenge. This bill presents a comprehensive and integrated policy approach to address the conservation and environmental issues affecting U.S. agriculture in the 1990's. These are logical steps which can help our Nation's farmers and ranchers better protect our valuable natural resources.

My goal in introducing this legislation is to help focus public debate on what we realistically can achieve in the 1990 farm bill to improve resource conservation and environmental quality in rural America.

The ARC Act presents us with an approach that can help us properly balance the economic health of agriculture with the protection of our natural resources. The ARC Act would provide farmers with the tools and incentives to develop and implement long-range plans for the protection of our soil and water resources.

No one is closer to the land than the farmer who works it from sun up to sun down, who drinks from its waters, and who enjoys the blessings of its lifestyle every day. No one has a bigger stake in protecting the land and the environment both today and for future generations than American farmers.

Major provisions in H.R. 4713, the Agricultural Resources Conservation [ARC] Act of 1990, would:

Modify current conservation programs, including sodbuster and swampbuster, to improve their implementation and effectiveness.

Extend for 5 years enrollment of lands into the Conservation Reserve Program [CRP] and increase the enrollment target up to 50 million acres; lands that could be enrolled into the CRP would include wetlands, endangered species habitat, ground water well head areas and other environmentally sensitive areas.

Establish a long-term conservation easement program to provide more permanent protection of environmentally sensitive lands; create a National Agricultural Wetlands Reserve to promote wetlands preservation.

Expand and enhance current efforts to protect the Nation's water resources, wetlands, and wildlife habitat through development of voluntary, 5-year, agricultural resource conservation [ARC] plans tailored to meet producers' specific conservation needs; included are incentives to farmers for developing ARC plans, including protection of acreage base, cost share and loan assistance, and other benefits. ARC plans could be developed by individual producers to: promote the protection, restoration, and mitigation of wetlands impacted by agricultural practices; or encourage the adoption of alternative agricultural practices on environmentally sensitive lands to protect water quality; or provide agricultural producers technical and financial assistance for the protection and enhancement of fish and wildlife habitat; or as an alternative, a comprehensive ARC plan could be developed and implemented by agricultural producers; this would involve 10-year stewardhip plans to protect soil, water, wetland, and wildlife resources in a comprehensive and integrated manner.

Promote tree planting on set-aside and reserved lands to control soil erosion, improve water quality, provide wildlife habitat and aesthetics and help mitigate the effects of global warming; reauthorize the highly successful Great Plains Conservation Program.

Require on-farm recordkeeping where restricted-use pesticides are applied in agriculture; records would be maintained by producers for a 2-year period following use.

Establish an Office of Environmental Quality within the U.S. Department of Agriculture; the Office would be charged with ensuring that all USDA programs and policies are reviewed for their consistency with the Department's environmental protection goals; the Office would also facilitate better communication and cooperation with other Federal agencies responsible for promoting environmental quality, especially the Environmental Protection Agency.

VOICE OF DEMOCRACY SCHOLARSHIP PROGRAM

HON. HELEN DELICH BENTLEY

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mrs. BENTLEY. Mr. Speaker, today I rise to offer my congratulations to a student residing in Hydes, MD, who recently competed in the VFW's annual Voice of Democracy scriptwriting contest. Last month, Martin Kelley, Jr., a student at Calvert Hall College High School, distinguished himself by receiving 1 of 12 scholarships awarded in the writing contest that drew 137,000 participants from around the Nation.

The Voice of Democracy Scholarship Program was first organized 43 years ago as a collaborative effort, with the Veterans of Foreign Wars assuming sole responsibility for the program after 1961. During the past 29 years, the annual scholarships have been increased to 12, with combined prize money totaling $56,000.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Kelly's prize winning essay, entitled: "Why I am Proud of America," be included in the RECORD following my remarks.

WHY I AM PROUD OF AMERICA

(By Martin Thomas Kelly, Jr., Maryland Winner, 1989/90 VFW Voice of Democracy Scholarship Program)

"The land was ours before we were the land's . . . Such as we were we gave ourselves outright . . . To the land vaguely realizing westward, But still unstoried, artless, unenhanced . . . Such as she was, such as she would become".

Bringing poetry to both history and audience at John Kennedy's Inaugural in 1961, American poet laureate Robert Frost expresses why I am most proud of America. Be proud, his words insist, not just because America is beautiful or green or spacious. Be proud because of the story. The ever-unfolding American adventure truly stories, gives art to, and enhances the land. Yes, it is the gift of our American history . . . a story of paradox, people, . . . possibilities . . . of which I am most proud.

Our history is one of paradox, of themes contradictory. Intolerant Puritans cut out the tongues of Quakers, while the descendants of both would pen the 1st Amendment guaranteeing religious liberty and free speech to all. In 1789, compromise characterized the search for constitution, while in the 1860's, an unwillingness to compromise divided nation, freeing the unfree. Ironically, white sheeted knights were not the "goodguys" as they frightened immigrants less America be colored with brogues and bratworst and those always hopeful immigrant eyes. Throughout the American Story, skepticism has usually preceded invitation: yet, Ford's black Model-T rolled across the land, Orville's plane lifted, and Goddard's craft rocketed us to the stars. The shocks, shells, and shrapnel of I promised "a world safe for democracy", while the lingering mushroom clouds of II created doubts and fears there would be no more world. Intolerance . . . tolerance. Compromise . . . belligerence, skepticism . . . invention, hope . . . disillusionment . . . each of these historical paradoxes legacies a thematic gift, offering meaning to America the land, while serving as a lesson to her people. Paradox makes our country what it has been, what it would yet become.

Today, the American people continue the story. You see, this powerful story goes on, and you and I have a chapter to write. I am proud of that opportunity, but what will our chapter be? Many questions demand answers.

How erase the pervasive drug scourge? How house the freezing homeless? What role ethics and morality? How respond to international cries for liberty . . . a link to our own heritage? These are the questions which haunt, dare and taunt, and beckon the American people . . . you and I! How do we responsibly answer these questions sprung from the heart of our story? Let us start by learning from the story already lived. With all its paradoxes, the colorful story can teach us to respond to our questions more faithfully, reasonably, and compassionately. We the people make America what it is, what it will become.

For tomorrow, the possibilities are endless. Future Americans will elaborate, interpret and hopefully continue to learn from the American story. New questions will be asked: Where rid disarmed weapons and plutonium wastes? How preserve green fields, and clean air and water? Can we live on the moon? How protect endangered wildlife? Future generations will be faced with their own possibilities. They will have their own responses and write their own chapters. They will tell the story and the story will tell them. It will be their challenge, our challenge to story, give art to, and enhance our land. Possibilities will make America all that it is yet to become.

Why I am proud of America? Our story is the gift outright, Paradox . . . people . . . possibilities. Yes, I am most proud of the American story, a gift very much our own.

TAXPAYER CONFIDENCE RESTORATION ACT

HON. DAVID DREIER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Speaker, the Internal Revenue Service [IRS] estimates that Americans will fail to pay at least $100 billion in Federal taxes on legal income in 1990. In addition, a recent survey by Money magazine shows that the public believes, by a 35-percent to 17 percent margin, that the new Federal income tax system is less fair than the pre-1986 system.

In an effort to restore taxpayer confidence in the Tax Code, improve compliance, reduce IRS collection burdens, and raise revenues without a tax increase, I introduced H.R. 4725, the Taxpayer Confidence Restoration Act. The bill establishes a Federal tax amnesty program, and calls for a flat-rate tax system which broadens the tax base and lowers marginal rates for all individuals to 15 percent.

H.R. 4725 allows taxpayers that voluntarily disclose to the IRS a previous tax evasion to pay the underpayment disclosed and any interest due on that underpayment in exchange for a waiver from criminal or civil penalties. The IRS will have the authority to enter into an offer-in-compromise with certain taxpayers whereby the taxpayer agrees to make a partial payment and the Treasury Department agrees to forgive the balance of taxes, penalties, and interest due.

The IRS will also have the authority to establish installment payment agreements. The IRS would develop national guidelines for IRS district offices to use in handling such offers and contracts. Outside private collection agencies would be contracted to act as collection agents for receipt of the installment payments.

The tax amnesty would be a one-time offer with a 3-month termination date. It will be based on voluntary disclosure. The disclosure must come before the opening of an investigation by the IRS, and the scope of immunity would be extended to only those years in which a disclosure was made.

From 1982 to 1987, State tax amnesty programs collected over $1.2 billion. Estimates of potential revenue increases from a Federal program range from $7 to $10 billion a year for a continuous program. The budget resolution being considered by the House calls for $13.9 billion in new unspecified revenues for fiscal year 1991. A Federal tax amnesty program could provide most of those revenues without a tax increase.

Mr. Speaker, there are millions of honest, hard-working Americans who, for a number of reasons, fail to report taxable income to the IRS. For some, there is an inability to comprehend the Tax Code. For others, it is a Tax Code that creates disincentives to work. Many elderly workers, for example, work for cash because their income is subject to marginal tax rates as high as 100 percent as a result of the Social Security earnings test. Whatever the reason, the success of State amnesty programs shows that a significant number of individuals are willing to step forward if they are not confronted with criminal sanctions.

The combination of a 15-percent flat-rate tax system and a Federal tax amnesty program will do more than just create a code that taxpayers will understand, have confidence in, and perceive to be fair. It will improve the performance of the economy because lower marginal tax rates will create greater incentives for productivity and growth. In addition, lower tax rates will help to reduce incentives for tax evasion in the future.

JOSEPH MERCURIO: COMMUNITY LEADER

HON. NITA M. LOWEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mrs. LOWEY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of my colleagues to the honor that is being bestowed on Joseph Mercurio by the New Rochelle Democratic Party.

Mr. Mercurio is being honored at the New Rochelle Democratic Party's victory dinner for his outstanding commitment and dedication to the party over the course of many long years.

He has held many prominent positions of leadership within the party for many years. These positions include district leader, area leader, and member of the executive board. An active participant in many campaigns, he worked for Vincent Rippa in his race for county legislator and mayor of New Rochelle. Joe was campaign manager for Ron Tocci in his race for county legislator, Judge Tom O'Toole in his city court race, and David Streger in his campaign for mayor. He has also campaigned for Sam Spady in his race for city council and for former Congressman Richard Ottinger. In addition, I recently appointed Joe to serve on the Air Force Academy Review Board.

His activity has not been limited to politics. He has also been extremely energetic in community affairs. Joe is a former chairman of the New Rochelle Parks and Recreation Forum, former president of the New Rochelle Exchange Club, and a former member of the New Rochelle Youth Bureau. Finally, he is a member of the Knights of Columbus No. 339, American Legion Post 8, and a member of the New Rochelle Hall of Fame Committee.

With regard to his unswerving commitment on behalf of his community, the honor bestowed upon Mr. Mercurio is richly deserved. I highly commend the New Rochelle Democratic Party for deciding to honor such an outstanding and meritorious American. This is an honor which is richly deserved.

CENTRAL EUROPE AND THE IMF

HON. JOHN J. LaFALCE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. LAFALCE. Mr. Speaker, this coming weekend, finance ministers, central bankers, and commercial bankers will be meeting in Washington under the auspices of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank.

Since these officials came together last spring at the annual Interim Committee meeting, the world has changed dramatically—nowhere more so than in central Europe. In January, I led a 13-member delegation to several countries in central Europe to learn first-hand the difficulties facing the courageous people of Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, East Germany, and Yugoslavia.

The United States is in the process of trying to help these countries make the unprecedented transition from Communist rule to democracy and free markets. It will be a long and difficult struggle—particularly on the economic front—and the financial resources of the United States are embarrassingly short at this time.

Therefore, I am very pleased to see that the IMF and the World Bank are taking a leading role in this part of the world. In the last Congress, we approved a general capital increase for the World Bank which doubled its lending resouces over a period of 6 years. Soon, it is expected that the IMF will seek to increase its resources by about 50 percent. When Members are asked to vote on the IMF quota increase, we should keep in mind the critical assistance this important institution is expected to provide to the emerging democracies of central Europe.

In this regard, I would like to share with my colleagues the recent remarks of Michael Camdessus, the managing director of the IMF.

[From the Financial Times, April 20, 1990]

EASTERN EUROPEAN REFORM—BEST OF BOTH WORLDS

(By Michael Camdessus)

The so far peaceful revolution sweeping through eastern Europe raises critical questions. Will all its promise be fulfilled? Will the process of reform be derailed?

Can the people of eastern Europe enjoy the best of both worlds, by reaping the benefits of a market system while retaining some of the apparent security of the planned system? Can reforms be implemented gradually, to reduce the disruption? Most difficult of all: is it possible, after these countries have suffered scarcities for so long, to ask them now to undertake such hard adjustments? No one could pretend to have complete answers to these questions, but experience suggests some pointers.

Attempts to find a "third way" between central planning and a market economy have not been successful. Partial reforms failed in both Hungary and Poland. Both now accept the need for a more fundamental reshaping of their systems.

If the aim is fundamental change in the system, it is probably a mistake to take a piecemeal approach. Because all the elements of the economic system are related, it is desirable, if you want a market-oriented system to work effectively, to introduce all the main elements at the outset.

You will want a price system that sends the right signals to producers and consumers, that reflects relative scarcities, and encourages an efficient allocation of resources. Freeing prices also means moving towards a more flexible system of wage determination. With a freer wage system, you need labour market policies that encourage labour mobility. This also implies giving up some of the job security that has been a customary feature in these countries.

With greater scope for market forces, you will have to allow more decentralized decision-making. Enterprise managers have to learn to be fully accountable for their decisions, in a system that permits both the rewards of success—profits—and the counsequences of failure—bankruptcy. At the same time, a social safety net is needed. These domestic elements of reform will work best if the system is simultaneously reformed to open the economy to foreign competition and the benefits of fuller participation in the world trading system.

It is probably impossible to introduce these and the other necessary institutional and legal changes overnight, and it is important to design them carefully: but proper decision-making will develop more readily if elements of a market-oriented system are put in place from the beginning.

The economic reforms will only produce good results if they take place in an environment of strong financial discipline at all levels—from governments to individual companies. This means giving up long-held habits such as the tendency to subsidise or protect inefficient or ailing companies. We know all too well from some of the advanced industrial countries how hard it can be to resist pressures for such subsidies—and how costly it is to society if governments fail to stand firm.

The introduction of market reforms in centrally planned economies can unleash pent-up forces that are hard to predict, and that need to be dissipated by appropriate policies. Prices are the most vivid example. Typically the pre-reform price system will contain many prices—for basic food items, housing and fuel, say—that have been kept artificially low for social reasons.

Low administered prices usually conceal a huge amount of repressed inflation—excess money holdings and shortages of goods that are reflected in long queues, black markets, and cumbersome barter arrangements. When these prices are freed, and market forces start to produce a correct structure of relative prices, there is almost always an initial surge of price increases. This can be a relatively short-term phenomenon but only if financial conditions are kept tight enough to absorb the excess liquidity. If financial policies are loose, then inflation can snowball when price controls are lifted, and a price-wage spiral can quickly get out of hand.

Economic reforms alone are not enough. Reforming countries need financial assistance and investment. They will require considerable help from abroad, and a readiness on the part of the advanced industrial countries in particular to expand their trading and financial links with eastern Europe. The EC countries should continue to openly and generously welcome their eastern neighbours.

The IMF is extending substantial financial assistance to some of the reforming countries, to contribute to a closer integration of their economies into the global trading and financial network, and to act as a catalyst for financing from other sources.

Poland may be a test case for the comprehensive approach to reforms. It started from a situation of economic crisis with $40bn of convertible currency debt, and entered the last quarter of 1989 with an inflation rate of more than 30 per cent a month, falling output, and a widening and unsustainable current account deficit. In this difficult position, the newly elected government has introduced, in very short order, a major economic package.

There are grave risks in the Polish programme, but so far the results are encouraging. We had thought that the first three months would be crucial, particularly as regards inflation—and if inflation had remained out of control, then other elements of the package would have been doomed. But prices have stabilised, after an initial spurt in January, when key prices were freed.

On this basis, we are reasonably confident that the Polish programme will succeed, provided that authorities persevere with their reforms and the external support continues.

The years ahead will be difficult for the countries that are introducing reforms. There is much that the international community, including the IMF, can and should do to ease the transition and welcome these countries into a more complete participation in the world economic system. Everything must be done to help them succeed.

INTRODUCTION OF THE GARAGE DOOR OPENER SAFETY ACT

HON. GERRY SIKORSKI

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. SIKORSKI. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing the Garage Door Opener Safety Act today to protect children from unsafe automatic garage door openers.

According to the Consumer Product Safety Commission [CPSC], 55 American kids have died since 1973 from automatic garage door openers that come down and don't reverse. These tragic deaths could have been prevented if the garage doors had been required to comply with the 1982 safety standards maintained by the Underwriters Laboratories, [UL]. The safety standards, however, are only voluntary, and despite warnings from CPSC to disconnect and replace all openers that do not meet the voluntary standards, approximately 10 million unsafe openers are still in operation.

In the past 2 years, three families in my State of Minnesota have lost young children to garage door openers. In one instance a boy was putting away his bicycle when the door descended and knocked him down. He was found by his father—pinned face down under the door. On that same day across town a 6-year-old girl was found crushed by another garage door. She was at home alone and no one witnessed the accident.

Minnesota is not alone. The CPSC has compiled reports from 21 States over the last 8 years and found a host of children between the ages of 2 and 14 who have died from being pinned under garage doors.

We can't just shrug our shoulders and say "accidents happen" when 55 kids have been killed and thousands horribly injured. These accidents could have been easily prevented. With 43 of these deaths having occurred since the 1982 voluntary standards, it is clear that we must do more than volunteer standards that volunteer our kids for harm.

This Garage Door Opener Safety Act, working through the CPSC, establishes minimum Federal safety standards for manufacturing and labeling, and notifies owners of systems of the hazards of entrapment. As a rule of the Consumer Product Safety Commission, the Garage Door Opener Safety Act prevents further killing of kids in four ways. First, the act requires that by January 1, 1991 all new automatic garage door opening systems conform to the requirements of the Underwriters Laboratories, Inc. Standards for Safety-UL 325, third edition, as revised May 4, 1988. These requirements state that door reversal must occur within 2 seconds of contacting a two inch test object whose top inch is resilient and whose bottom inch is rigid. In addition, the 1982 revision requires that the door reopen if the bottom limit switch is not activated within 30 seconds after the control is pressed to start the closing cycle.

Second, the Act further requires by January 1st, 1993, all automatic garage doors sold to include an optical sensor, or a device found by the CPSC to provide equivalent protection which when activated causes a closing door to open. To further protect children, the reversing mechanism must contain a fail-safe device that prevents the system from operating if the reversing mechanism stops working. Without this fail-safe device, parents can be fooled into believing their garage door opener is operating safely when the reversing mechanism is actually defective.

Third, to help consumers make informed purchases, a manufacturer selling or offering for sale an automatic garage door opening system must clearly identify on any container of the system and on the system itself, the month and year the system was manufactured and its conformance with the new requirements. Labeling will help educate the public of the dangers of garage door openers.

Fourth, to warn the owners of the entrapment hazards of existing automatic garage door openers—regardless of date of manufacture—the Garage Door Opener Safety Act requires by July 1, 1991, that manufacturers, through their warranty registration lists, contact and advise owners to test their systems for the automatic reverse feature. Hopefully, notified owners will help replace the old garage door openers, which are the most dangerous because they are not designed to reverse automatically upon striking an obstruction. The life of some garage door openers can be extremely long—there have been systems found that were manufactured more than 40 years ago.

While the Garage Door Opener Safety Act is vital to replacing unsafe systems, it doesn't provide the entire solution. There are at least 20 million openers in operation in America. Possibly as many as 10 million of these do not even meet the 1982 UL voluntary standards, and some are not equipped with safety reverse features. To replace and repair the unsafe old openers, States should follow the example that Minnesota has set. I am proud that my home State has taken the lead by requiring all servicing and repairing of old systems to bring the opener up to the new standards.

I insert a section-by-section analysis in the RECORD:

GARAGE DOOR OPENER SAFETY ACT—SECTION BY SECTION ANALYSIS

SECTION 1. CONSUMER PRODUCT SAFETY RULE

Deems the provisions of Section 2 of this act a consumer product safety rule issued by the Consumer Product Safety Commission under Section 9 of the Consumer Product Safety Act.

SECTION 2. AUTOMATIC GARAGE DOOR SYSTEMS

Part (a). Prohibitions

Prohibits any one from manufacturing for sale, offering for sale, distributing in commerce, or importing into the U.S. for sale in interstate commerce an automatic garage door opener for a residential building that does not comply with the requirements of this act.

Part (b). Requirements

Section (1). Requires by January 1, 1991 all garage door manufacturers to conform to the voluntary requirements of the Underwriters Laboratories, Inc. Standards for Safety-UL 325. The standard states that door reversal must occur within 2 seconds of contacting a two inch test object whose top inch is resilient and whose bottom inch is rigid. In addition, the 1982 revision requires that the door reopen if the bottom limit switch is not activated within 30 seconds after the control is pressed to start the closing cycle.

Section (2). Requires by January 1, 1993 all automatic garage door openers to include (in addition to Standards for Safety-UL 325) an optical sensor, or a device found by the CPSC to provide equivalent protection from entrapment, which when activated causes a closing door to open. The device must include a fail-safe mechanism that prevents the machine from operating when it malfunctions.

Part (c). Labeling

Requires all automatic garage door openers and their boxes to be identified by the month and year it was manufactured, and its conformance with the requirements of Part (b) by January 1, 1991.

Part (d). Notification

Requires manufacturers, through their warranty registration lists, to notify owners of automatic garage door openers (regardless of date of manufacture) of the hazards of entrapment, and to advise owners to test their system for the safety standards in Part (b).

SECTION 3. PREEMPTION

Only those laws of States or political subdivisions which do not provide a stronger degree of protection from the risk of injury associated with garage door opening systems shall be subject to preemption.

WILLIAM S. MORTENSEN: A TRULY DISTINGUISHED CITIZEN

HON. MEL LEVINE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Speaker, it is with distinct pleasure that I rise today to express my admiration, respect, and gratitude to a good friend, and devoted family man and a valuable resource in our community. A lifelong resident of Los Angeles, William S. Mortensen has helped our beautiful city grow and prosper through his work in local charities and his position as chairman of the board of First Federal Bank of California. On Wednesday, May 9, Bill Mortensen will be honored by the Anti-Defamation League with its 1990 Distinguished Citizen Award during a banquet in his honor at the Regent Beverly Wilshire.

William S. Mortensen is a hard working and energetic man who has devoted many years to improving our Nation's savings and loan industry. Embarking upon his business career as a teller at First Fed in 1955, Bill was appointed president of the institution in 1969 and chairman of the board in 1983. He is considered one of the most prominent National figures in the thrift industry and frequently testifies before Congress. A leader in the movement to establish a sound and stable thrift industry, Bill serves on the board of directors of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board in San Francisco. He is also past president of the California League of Savings Institutions, the National Council of Savings Institutions and the Conference of Federal Savings and Loan Associations.

Despite numerous obligations to his work, Bill donates his services to many important community organizations. He is a trustee of St. John's Hospital and Health Center Foundation and a member of the board of councilors of the Ethel Percy Andrus Gerontology Center at the University of Southern California. Bill also works on behalf of the Santa Monica Jaycees, the Boys' Club of Santa Monica, local schools, and has held campaign leadership positions with the Los Angeles United Way.

For his many contributions to our community Bill has been honored with the Gold Medallion Award from the Boys' Club of America and the Brotherhood Award and the Humanitarian Award from the national Conference of Christians and Jews. A loving husband and father of six children, Bill has long recognized the need to improve our country's education system. In recognition of Bill's work on behalf of education, Santa Monica High School recently named its library in his honor.

Mr. Speaker, it is for all of these reasons that William S. Mortensen has been presented the 1990 Distinguished Citizen Award by the Anti-Defamation League. I strongly urge my colleagues in the U.S. House of Representatives to join me in honoring my good friend Bill Mortensen for the many years he has selflessly devoted to our community.

A CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO VINCE J. TRUDNICH

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to one of the most active members of the Los Angeles harbor community, Vince J. Trudnich, upon his being honored May 5, 1990, by the Los Angeles Area Council Boy Scouts of America as the Harbor District Good Scout of the Year.

This occasion gives me the opportunity to recognize the lifelong civic contributions of Vince Trudnich. It is my distinct privilege to pay tribute to him, once again, because his dedication to our community of San Pedro is as strong today as it was nearly 40 years ago. While Vince holds the distinction as being a former honorary mayor of San Pedro, he also is recognized for having volunteered countless years to virtually every civic organization that exists in our community: ranging from the Boy Scouts, Jaycees, and chamber of commerce; to the Lions Club, Yugoslav-American Club and the Retarded Children's Foundation. And, the extent to which Vince has served the harbor area also is reflected in the number of directorships that he has held, as well as the numerous awards that he has earned during these past four decades.

However, Mr. Speaker, the significance behind this service is more than just titles and awards. Vince Trudnich has been and continues to be a valuable leader of our community. As a lifelong San Pedro resident, Vince has returned to our community far more than what he has received from it. Without individuals like Vince, San Pedro simply would not be the home that it is to so many of us. Clearly, in the case of Vince Trudnich, one person has made a difference.

My wife, Lee, and I extend our sincere thanks to Vince for his countless contributions to the Los Angeles harbor area. We deeply appreciate the kindness that he has extended to so many grateful people in our community. Congratulations certainly are in order as Vince is about to earn yet another deserving honor—this time from the Boy Scouts of America. Vince, we wish you, your wife, Lillie, and your children, James, Larry, David, and Mark all the best in the years to come.

HONOR THY FATHER AND MOTHER

HON. MARY ROSE OAKAR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday, May 1, the House Aging Subcommittee on Health and Long-Term Care released its latest report, "Elder Abuse: A Decade of Shame and Inaction," on the status of State and Federal efforts to confront the scandalous problem of elder abuse in the United States. As the title suggests, the findings of Chairman ROYBAL's 50 State survey were extremely disturbing.

Since the late Chairman Pepper first coined the term for this national disgrace in 1978, very little Federal assistance has gone to the states in their efforts to identify and prevent such abuse or assist victims of elder abuse. The report found that 1.5 million—1 in 20—older Americans fell prey to severe abuse or neglect in 1988—a 50-percent increase over the findings of the committee's landmark 1980 study. Most elder abuse occurs in the home and is committed by family members; 40 percent of all reported abuse in the United States is adult abuse—70 percent of adult abuse is elder abuse. Most of the abused are dependent upon their abusers, and many fear reprisal or merely cannot overcome their instinctive love for their children to turn them in.

In 1980, I joined forces with Senator Pepper by introducing legislation intended to set up a National Center on Elder Abuse. Despite a strong bipartisan will, and overwhelming support from the States, Congress has repeatedly failed to pass this modest proposal. CBO estimates the cost of H.R. 220 to be $10 million when fully phased in, and requires State matching funds, which most States already put up. This center would collect data, conduct research, and disseminate, information on elder abuse. Also H.R. 220 would authorize HHS to award grants for demonstration programs and projects. This is very similar to successful programs to combat child abuse in our Nation.

The Aging Committee report, along with adult protective services all across the country, calls for quick passage of H.R. 220. In 1980, this problem was largely unheard of in our country—only 16 States required mandatory reporting of elder abuse at that time. Since then, 43 States have adopted adult protective services. Still, the incidence of elder abuse has increased.

Mr. Speaker, the States have done all that they can. I urge my colleagues to help them fight this horrendous national problem through cosponsorship and passage of H.R. 220 in the 101st Congress. As Chairman ROYBAL stated at the May 1 hearing, this problem "confounds the Commandment, 'Honor thy Father and Mother'." May the findings of this Aging Committee report weigh heavily on the conscience of this Congress and the administration until we take decisive action to deal with this disgrace head on.

POLAND'S STRUGGLE FOR DEMOCRACY AND A FREE MARKET ECONOMY

HON. CHESTER G. ATKINS

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Speaker, a short time ago, our colleague from New York, Representative STEPHEN J. SOLARZ, delivered one of the most compelling statements I have heard on the immense political and economic challenges Poland faces as she struggles to complete her remarkable transition from the darkness of totalitarianism into the sunshine of freedom.

Representative SOLARZ has also explained in his customary vigorous style why the United States has a huge stake in Poland successfully making this transition.

And because I believe that Mr. SOLARZ' words deserve the widest possible circulation, I now ask that they be included in the RECORD:

ADDRESS BY REPRESENTATIVE STEPHEN J. SOLARZ

Niech żyje Polska niezależna!

Niech żyje Polska demokratyczna!

Once again the fate of Poland is tied to events taking place on its western and eastern borders. To its west it watches with anxiety the process of German unification. To its east it watches with concern the Soviet response to the peaceful pleas of the Lithuanian people for the sovereignty that was taken from them by brute force a half century ago.

How these political developments and diplomatic challenges are resolved will determine, to a significant extent, whether Poland will be able to consolidate its democracy and develop its economy in the future, or whether, as in the past, its hopes for freedom and its aspirations for independence are crushed by the twin and repressive forces of German nationalism and Russian expansionism.

And once again, as in 1939 and 1945, decisions made here in the United States will have an important, perhaps even decisive impact on the outcome.

Forty-five years ago, as Allied armies advanced toward Berlin, the Big Three met in Yalta and Potsdam, without the presence or participation of Polish leaders, to discuss and decide the fate of Poland. For more than four decades, Poland has paid the price of that exclusion in political dictatorship, national despair, and economic deprivation.

We must not make the same mistake again. This time, when the fate and future of Germany is being decided, the representatives of the democratically elected government of Poland must be there.

Fifty years after the beginning of World War II, it would be morally unforgivable and politically unacceptable to exclude from the talks designed to bring a favorable end to the Second World War representatives of the country whose invasion by Germany marked the beginning of the conflict.

I am pleased to tell you that I recently sent a letter to President Bush, signed by almost thirty of my colleagues, democrats and Republicans alike, calling on the President to make sure that Poland participates in these fateful negotiations.

A short while ago, perhaps in response to this and similar demands, it was announced that Polish representatives would, indeed, be included in discussions on the German border. This was good. But it was not good enough.

Poland needs to be included in all discussions involving Polish security, not just those on the German border. And let us make sure that a treaty establishing the Oder-Neisse line as the permanent and irreversible boundary of Poland and Germany is negotiated before rather than after German unification.

But Poland is threatened not just in the west but in the east. At this very moment, soviet forces are moving through the streets of Vilnius, in a blatant effort to intimidate the Lithuanian people. At this critical moment in the history of Baltic republics, we must let the Soviet leaders know that how they resolve this problem will have important consequences for East-West relations in general and U.S.-Soviet relations in particular. If they want the benefits of western trade and technology, it will have to be resolved peacefully.

The Soviet leaders must be made to understand that nations occupied by force cannot be kept by force, and that their best interests, no less than ours, require a peaceful transition to a new and more equitable relationship between Moscow and its constituent republics.

Just as the emancipation of Eastern Europe will ultimately contribute to the security and development of the Soviet Union, so too will the transformation of the existing union of subservient republics into a conferation of independent nations contribute to the security and development of the soviet Union as well.

But even if the process of German unification and the crisis in the Baltics can be peacefully and prudently resolved abroad, Poland still faces enormous social and economic problems at home.

Not content to have led the way to the political reforms which are now transforming one Eastern Europe country after another from a crypto-Stalinist dictatorship into a genuine parliamentary democracy, Poland, under the leadership of Prime Minister Mazowiecki, is also pioneering the path to corresponding economic reform as well. It is now undertaking something which has never been done before—the quick and comprehensive transformation of a state controlled into a free market economy.

It will not be easy. It will not be painless. The situation is likely to get worse before it gets better. whether it succeeds or fails will determine the future prospects for political pluralism and economic prosperity in Poland—and elsewhere in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union, where this experiment in political and economic reform is being closely watched. And whether it succeeds will depend, to a significant extent, on whether the west is prepared to provide Poland the assistance it will need to translate the promise of democracy and a market economy into a better life for the Polish people.

If we could spend trillions of dollars in the last forty years to defend Western Europe from the threat of Soviet aggression, surely we can invest 20-30 billion dollars, together with our friends and allies in the industrialized world, to guarantee the success of democracy in Eastern Europe.

MOBUTU TO ALLOW OPPOSITION PARTIES

HON. DAN BURTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, Zaire is undergoing a historic period of change. Apparently, not even Africa is immune to the worldwide tide of freedom. The enclosed article from the Washington Post outlines the changes announced by President Mobutu. The United States ought to encourage and support this process.

[From the Washington Post, Apr. 25, 1990]

MOBUTU TO ALLOW OPPOSITION PARTIES

(By Ntoto Waku)

KINSHASA, ZAIRE, April 24.—Bowing to weeks of pressure, President Mobutu Sese Seko of Zaire said today he has lifted a 20-year ban on opposition parties and will let a multi-party government replace his in a year.

Thousands of Zairians chanting, singing and waiving branches, poured into downtown Kinshasa, the capital, and blocked the streets to cheer the president's decision.

Mobutu, absolute ruler since taking power Nov. 24, 1965, announced in a broadcast speech that he was setting up a transitional government to rule until free elections could be held. No election date was set.

"I am taking leave of the Popular Movement for the Revolution," said Mobutu, 59. He said he would no longer be head of the party that supplanted the government in 1970, but would remain as president "at the request of the people of Zaire."

Mobutu said three parties will be allowed at first. His Popular Movement for the Revolution, which under Zaire's law was the counry's government, no longer will hold special status, he said.

Mobutu said one leading opposition figure, Etienne Tshisekedi, was released from detention today and his Union for Democracy and Social Progress party legalized. He did not say which of several other opposition groups, whose leaders are in exile, would be selected as the third legal party.

He said the constitution will be rewritten and a transitional government established until elections are held. The elections will produce a new government by April 24, 1991, he said.

In recent weeks, Mobutu had been battered by a wave of unprecedented criticism.

He began a tour of the nation in January, seeking public comment on his rule. Thousands of replies were sent in from business groups, churches, unions, students and individuals. Many bitterly criticized the government and Mobutu himself, accusing the president and his cronies of corruption and monopolizing power. The country's Roman Catholic bishops compared Mobutu's rule to a monarchy.

Mobutu did not reply directly to the criticisms but promised that "the will of the majority will be respected. We will proceed together on the changes wanted by the majority."

Like most African presidents, Mobutu has asserted one-party rule was the only way to avoid tribalism. In the country's first five years of independence, more than 100,000 people died in fighting attributed to ethnic or regional conflicts.

Since 1970, every citizen of Zaire has been automatically registered as a member of the official party. Opposition groups were brutally repressed, and Mobutu claimed 99.99 percent of the vote in presidential elections.

He renamed the country Zaire and ordered Zairians to replace their Christian names with African names. Men were required to replace Western-style suits and neckties with high-necked jackets.

As part of his campaign to replace European influences, Mobutu ordered that people address each other as "citizen," rather than "sir" or "madame." He changed his own name from Joseph Desire Mobutu to Mobutu Sese Seko, translated as "the all powerful warrior."

Perhaps most symbolic about Mobutu's announcement today was his declaration that Western-style suits would no longer be banned, and people could again call each other "sir" or "madame."

After taking power, Mobutu nationalized key industries, including copper production, and replaced expatriate advisers and experts with Zairians.

Production collapsed, along with much of the country's infrastructure. Mobutu was accused of using his plan to plunder the country's wealth. His critics say he amassed several billion dollars.

Twice he needed major Western military intervention to put down revolts, and international organizations and opposition leaders said he brutally repressed any opposition.

But the United States and other Western governments supported Mobutu, who was committed to opposing the expansion of Marxism in the region. Zaire has been a conduit of U.S. aid to anti-Marxist guerrillas in Angola, Zaire's southern neighbor.

STRICT ENFORCEMENT OF FOREIGN TAKEOVER LIMITS NEEDED

HON. DOUG WALGREN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. WALGREN. Mr. Speaker, we should underscore with the administration our increasing concern over the administration's tentative enforcement of the Exon-Florio provision of the 1988 Trade Act which authorizes the President to block foreign takeovers of U.S. companies that may threaten the national security.

Yesterday was the deadline the President gave the export arm of the People's Republic of China, CATIC, to divest itself of Mamco, Inc., an aerospace firm located in Washington State that the Chinese had acquired. To date, CATIC has not responded to the President's order, and it is unclear when divestiture can be expected to occur.

Foreign firms have made a variety of commitments in the process of acquisitions of other U.S. firms, and the administration has no systematic way to know to what extent these commitments are being honored. For example, the West German company, Huels AG, assured Treasury Secretary Brady that it would continue to supply United States companies, including Sematech, when it bought Monsanto's silicon division last year. There is no systematic process in the administration to monitor the situation to determine how this commitment is being fulfilled.

Exon-Florio can only be an effective tool in protecting the national security of the United States, if it is vigilantly enforced. The administration needs to set up a process of review to assure foreign firms comply with obligations imposed under its authority.

To demonstrate the complexity of some of the commitments made in this process, I would like to insert in the RECORD a portion of the Huels letter to Secretary Brady concerning its acquisition of Monsanto's silicon division.

JANUARY 23, 1989.

Hon. NICHOLAS F. BRADY,

Secretary, Department of the Treasury; Chairman, Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: To assist the CFIUS review of Huels' acquisition of Monsanto Electronic Materials Company ("MEMC"), I am providing the following information. We would like to emphasize again that Huels intends to run the combined MEMC/DNS entity as an American company that is incorporated in the United States and that has its headquarters in the United States. The majority of the corporate officers (including the chief executive officer) of the company will be U.S. citizens. In addition, a majority of the members of the board of directors will be U.S. citizens. The new entity will compy with all applicable American laws and regulations and with all contractual obligations that MEMC has entered into or that MEMC/DNS will enter into.

We would like to make several points with regard to the proposed acquisition. First, Huels has learned from Monsanto (see Monsanto letter attached) that Monsanto has not to date transferred any 8 inch wafer technology outside the United States.

MEMC/DNS and Huels will comply with all applicable requirements under U.S. export control laws regulating the exportation of technical data and equipment. This does of course include technical data and equipment relating to MEMC/DNS's 6 and 8 inch wafer activities. MEMC/DNS will always apply for whatever U.S. government approval may be required by law before exporting any technical data or equipment in its possession and before disclosing any technical data to foreign nationals in the United States.

Additionally, Huels and MEMC/DNS will not for a period of 5 years transfer MEMC's existing 8 inch wafer production equipment, MEMC's existing technical data related to 8 inch wafer production, or MEMC/DNS 8 inch wafer production technical data that is identifiably derived from MEMC's existing 8 inch wafer production technical data, to third parties (i.e., persons outside Huels and MEMC/DNS) that are not U.S. persons or that are controlled by non-U.S. persons. Our only concern is that MEMC/DNS not be placed at a competitive disadvantage to other American companies that possess the same categories of technical data and equipment as will MEMC/DNS.

Second, we emphasize our desire to supply wafers to SEMATECH, as MEMC has done in the past. We understand that MEMC does not currently have any contractual arrangements with SEMATECH. Should SEMATECH seek wafers from MEMC/DNS, a decision within the control of SEMATECH, MEMC/DNS will faithfully comply with obligations that may be agreed upon by SEMATECH and MEMC/DNS in the future, including appropriate constraints on transfers of SEMATECH technology and SEMATECH specifications to operations outside the United States or to the third parties described in the preceeding paragraph. In this regard, I must repeat that Huels and DNS have numerous arrangements with our customers for the protection of the customers' confidential information and have never had any problem whatsoever in complying with those obligations. Both Huels and DNS are acutely aware of the great need to protect proprietary information.

Third, Huels is prepared to enter into negotiations with SEMATECH for contractual arrangements that will make available to SEMATECH, under appropriate commercial terms, the fruits of future MEMC/DNS research.

Fourth, Huels is prepared to comply with a SEMATECH rule, if permissible under U.S. law, that no SEMATECH supplier, whether under contract or not, can enter into comparable arrangements with any other entity comparable to SEMATECH. However, if SEMATECH permits its suppliers to join, or to do business with such comparable entitites, directly or through a non-U.S. affiliate, then MEMC/DNS should have the same option. In other words, we believe MEMC/DNS must be treated the same as any other U.S. company that supplies SEMATECH.

Fifth, Huels intends not only to maintain MEMC's existing production sites and research activities in the United States but to expand those activities substantially. To this end, we plan to increase MEMC's existing investment plan, by approximately $50 million from Huels, within the next two to three years, for research and capital improvements in the United States, particularly for 8 inch wafer and epitaxial wafer production.

Finally, after the acquisition of MEMC is consummated, Huels will be required under the Hart-Scott-Rodino provisions of U.S. antitrust laws (see 16 CFR 802.51 (1988)) to report to the U.S. Government any change in the control of VEBA, Huels or the combined MENS/DNS. We fully intend to comply with this obligation and with any other notice obligation that may be imposed on us under U.S. law. Huels also will notify the U.S. Government of any proposed changes in the by-laws of VEBA or Huels affecting control over VEBA or Huels at the same time the company must notify its shareholders under German law. While a hostile takeover of a German company is, as a practical matter, inconceivable (e.g., article 21, paragraph 4, of VEBA's by-laws limits any individual stockholder's voting power to five percent of overall votes) and a friendly takeover of VEBA is also, in our view, inconceivable, should either event occur, everyone in the world would know before the fact due to the size and importance of VEBA. As we have said previously, VEBA is, if not the largest, one of the largest holding companies in Germany.

On behalf of Huels and VEBA, I can assure you that Huels and VEBA are committed to the above. I trust that the foregoing will help members of CFIUS conclude that the acquisition of MEMC by Huels will not impair the interests of the United States and will, in fact, promote those interests through creation of a dynamic new wafer production and research company serving the U.S. market. We look forward to working with the U.S. semiconductor industry.

Very truly yours,
Prof. Dr. C.M. KRAUCH,
Chairman of Huels,
Member of the Board of VEBA.

CREATE INCENTIVES FOR PEACE AND HUMAN RIGHTS IN EL SALVADOR

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to urge my colleagues to support the legislation to restructure United States aid to El Salvador that was produced last week by the Foreign Affairs Committee.

The beauty of this legislation is that it puts in place firm incentives for both the Salvadoran Government and the FMLN rebels to negotiate in good faith for peace. To begin with, through this proposal we would send a clear signal to the Salvadoran military and oligarchy that we in Congress will not continue our massive funding for approaches to the civil conflict in El Salvador. We would send that signal by cutting 50 percent of our military aid to the Government and redirecting that 50 percent to fund basic human needs in El Salvador. The proposal would create a clear incentive for the Salvadoran Government to negotiate for peace by conditioning the remaining 50 percent of military aid on their good faith participation in the United States-mediated peace talks.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation represents a balanced approach. As an incentive to the FMLN, we say that if it launches another major offensive against the Government during this time of negotiations or if it does not negotiate in good faith, then we will allow 100 percent of the military aid to flow to the Salvadoran Government. Thus, if the Salvadoran Government is threatened with military overthrow or even if the FMLN receives significant new shipments of outside weaponry, then full military aid will flow to the Government. There is nothing in this legislation which would put the Salvadoran Government at risk if it is sincere when it says it respects human rights and wants negotiations.

Mr. Speaker, some may argue that this legislation will weaken the hand of the Salvadoran Government at a time when talks with the FMLN are beginning and the Government must negotiate from a position of strength. My response is that this legislation only weakens the position of people who do not want negotiations and who want simply to continue making war in El Salvador. In fact, this planned restructuring of military aid to El Salvador would strengthen the hand of those in both the Government and rebel camps who want good faith negotiations for peace. Logically, if Salvadoran President Cristiani really wants to have a strong hand against the extremists in the military and in ARENA, then this aid restructuring will give him the tools and incentives he needs. Cristiani may have to publicly oppose the plan, but if he sincerely wants peace, then I do not see why he would oppose this plan. I also believe that if President Bush truly wants to see peace and human rights in El Salvador, then he too will support this plan.

For 10 years our Government has provided enormous quantities of weapons, financial assistance, and training to the military of El Salvador. With that aid, Congress and the American and Salvadoran people were promised that democracy, judicial reform, human rights, and peace would come to El Salvador. Unfortunately, it is clear that while some progress toward institutionalizing elections in El Salvador has been made, significant progres on the other fronts has not been made. Human rights abuses by members of the Salvadoran military continued and, as the Speaker's task force on the Jesuit murders found, the judicial system in El Salvador continues to be "neither systematic nor just."

In terms of peace, negotiations have been started and have failed several times in the past. That is why it is so important at this early point in a new round of talks to create concrete incentives for both sides to finally bring peace to El Salvador.

Mr. Speaker, the legislation passed by the Foreign Affairs Committee last week incorporates the right kind of incentives for peace in El Salvador and I urge my colleagues to vote for that legislation when it comes to the floor. Thank you.

ADMIRAL McKEE SPEAKS AT CHRISTENING OF U.S.S. "JEFFERSON CITY"

HON. IKE SKELTON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, March 24, the attack submarine U.S.S. Jefferson City, SSN 759, was christened by my wife Susie at Newport News, VA. This was truly a memorable event for the residents of Missouri's capital city, Jefferson City, all Missourians, and the U.S. Navy.

The principal speaker for the evening was Adm. Kinnaird R. McKee, USN, retired. His remarks were so appropriate, not just for the christening of this submarine, but for the critical times through which our country is passing. I wish to share Admiral McKee's address with the Members of this body.

The article follows:

ADMIRAL MCKEE SPEAKS AT CHRISTENING OF U.S.S. "JEFFERSON CITY"

This is a great day for a launching, and a special time to celebrate, in the 90th year of our submarine history, one of our oldest and most honored naval traditions.

This ship will soon be named for the city of Jefferson. Her remarkable young men will carry into the deep ocean the same pioneering spirit that led their forebears to open and settle the Missouri territory and build the city of Jefferson. They will serve in a different environment, but one just as relentless and unforgiving as the Missouri pioneers had to deal with.

And they too will have to do it alone, unsupported, outnumbered and far from the prospect of assistance.

This launching ceremony also marks the beginning of a special bond between this ship and her namesake city; one that will grow stronger and stronger as she is commissioned and goes off into the deep ocean. For Jefferson City, that bond will be unusually strong, because Missouri people and submarine sailors are cut from the same cloth. Tough, bright and skeptical, they live by the same "show me" motto.

They also share other traits. They know what they are about. They have the talent and the inclination not only to go in harm's way, but to live there, day in and day out. They are irreverant, but in the best military sense of the word. By that I mean they understand rank, but they respect proven competence in the field.

They also have to have the right tools to do the job. In our business, that means stealth, mobility, firepower and gumption. Newport News has designed and built the first three of those characteristics into the ship; the fourth is standard equipment in any good submarine crew.

Jefferson City is an attack submarine. Fast and heavily armed, this ship will have the range and endurance to do her work anywhere in the world. Tough and flexible she will be able to take punishment and stay on the line. Silent and deep diving, she will be essentially invulnerable in her own element. Properly handled, she can do things that most people can only imagine. And if conflict should come, she will always meet the competion on her terms.

In the final analysis, this is the most effective warship of its kind in the world today. It is also expensive, but well worth what John Adams once referred to as: "* * * the toil, blood, and treasure it will cost * * * to defend these States."

In fact, this ship is a bargain. At a time when it seems to have become stylish to ridicule the performance of some modern weapons systems, this extraordinarily complex ship works, and works well. At a time when some say the ocean is becoming transparent, this ship will remain invisible at sea.

And at a time when duty and service to country is no longer an experience that has been shared by most of our citizens, her crew will carry an awsome personal responsibility.

They know, that even today, they must remain strong to the task.

The evolution of the European political environment into one that encourages—perhaps a better word is permits—what may one day come to pass, has taken over forty years. The process has not been a natural one, but thus far it seems to have produced favorable, even remarkable results. We are encouraged by all this, but let us not forget that much of what is happening still rests upon a complex foundation made fragile by terrible uncertainty.

Our naval strength and that of our allies are critical factors in the structure of this environment. Major national investments have been required, but for forty-five years we have enjoyed a European peace that is the dividend of that investment. That is the real "peace dividend", not what is described in the contemporary lexicon of disarmament.

Last week, Betty Ann and I visited old friends in England and Italy. In the course of our journey, I finished the second volume of William Manchester's biography of Winston Churchill. It makes for thoughtful reading, particularly at a time when German politicians once again are called upon to guarantee the Polish border, when a Lithuanian declaration of independence has been rejected, and when in our own country, pressures for disarmament focus less on the question of what is needed than on how quickly the budget can be reduced.

It is useful to consider one of Manchester's early passages in the light of all this. He said: "The hard and bitter truth was that lasting demobilization of Europe could only be advanced steadily by" what Churchill described as "the harassing expense of fleets and armies, and by the growth of confidence in a long peace."

Recent Developments may well have increased prospects for continuing peace, but we are hardly at a point where we can arbitrarily discontinue the "harassing expense" that has helped make it possible.

This is an exciting time, but it is also a time for every thoughtful citizen to wonder: why the rush to judgement in defense matters? How will unseemly haste strengthen or speed what has been set in motion, or guarantee its success? Why not hold fast while thoughtful men structure policies that form the basis for safe navigation through a developing sea of uncertainty?

There may indeed be merit in not further strengthening our defenses, but there is a certain hazard in relaxing when the game is only in the first quarter. There may be less in the fourth quarter, but even then, at least some of the first team will have to stay in the game for the forseeable future.

Ladies and gentlemen, this (submarine force) is the first team.

The officers and men of Jefferson City know that very well, and they understand why it is so. They also know what will be asked of them if we are to (in the words of Thomas Jefferson) "* * * Respect (the strength) of others without fearing it."

So take a look at these officers and men, ladies and gentlemen; and also look at the families that support them. Tell your elected representatives about them. Not everyone on the hill understands what we ask of these young people—and how the more we ask, the more they give. Not everybody up there is like Ike Skelton.

An English clergyman once said there is: "* * * only one principle of public conduct. Do what you thing right and take place and power as an accident." That describes Susie Skelton's husband pretty well. He understands the responsibility entrusted to this crew. He also understands the unequivocal commitment that attends that responsibility. His distinguished service in the Congress and his two sons on active duty are eloquent testimony to the depth of his understanding. They are also an unequivocal demonstration of shared commitment.

In contemporary usage, "commitment" is more often a solgan than a way of life. But it was much more than that to the folks who built this country and made her free, remember the scene in the bicentennial play "1776", when John Adam's wife Abagail had to remind him:

"* * * There are only two creatures of value on the face of this Earth. Those who have made a commitment, and those who require the commitment of others."

Ladies and gentleman, what you see over there are indeed "creatures of value". They reflect the remarkable combination of races and creeds that has been the strength of our country since its beginning. Throughout our history, the framework of our civilization, our livelihood and our freedom have depended upon the shared commitment of such individuals. Commitment to do what's right, regardless of the personal consequences, in spite of the inconvenience and the loneliness, often in spite of the conventional wisdom, without asking "what's in it for me?" And without waiting for the other guy.

In 1837, there came a need for volunteers to serve against the Seminoles in Flordia. Today, one might argue the merits of that campaign, But at the time it was considered to be in the national interest and President Van Buren asked Senator Thomas Hart Benton: "* * * Whether Missourians could be induced to travel so far as the swamps of Florida.

Colonel Benton's reply reflects the spirit of the time and of the people he served:

"The Missourians will go wherever their services are needed."

The crew of Jefferson City is also ready to: "go wherever their services are needed". I reckon that makes them fit to be called Missourians as well as American sailors.

Watch 'em, folks. They'll made you proud.

MEETING OF VETERANS' ADVISORY COUNCIL

HON. GEORGE E. SANGMEISTER

OF ILLINOIS

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. SANGMEISTER. Mr. Speaker, as a veteran myself, I would like to take this time to recognize the dedication and commitment of 34 leaders of veteran organizations who make up the Veterans' Advisory Council of the Forth Congressional District of Illinois. On April 21, at the Joliet Holiday Inn, the Veterans Advisory Council held a discussion on "veterans' health care, benefits and eligibility." Steve Young of Hines VA Hospital, John Burlace of Manteno Veterans' Home, and myself answered an array of questions by veterans. As a member of the House Veterans' Affairs Committee, I was tremendously impressed by the large number of veterans who attended and participated in the event. Although I receive many letters from veterans which are very helpful for me to understand the problems they face, I enjoyed the personal communications this meeting has provided for all of us.

This forum also provided me the opportunity to clearly explain my efforts to establish a veterans' clinic in Joliet, to pass a constitutional amendment against flag burning, and my continual support for an increase in veterans' benefits. The success of this meeting was due to the efforts of the following leaders: Robert Touhy, D.A.V. Chapter No. 103; Mary Howard, Task Force Omega; John Hogan, Jr., V.F.W. Post No. 5788; Bill Robinette, Will County Vietnow; Brian Duffy, Illinois Vietnam Veterans Leadership Program; Stanley Tylinski, V.F.W. Post F No. 1493; Les Bacskai, U.A.W. Local No. 588; David Pressler, V.F.W. Post No. 2791; Leon Laplace, V.F.W. Post No. 2825; Louis Geist, American Legion Post No. 398; Leonard Forner, Sr., Amvets Post No. 103; Odean Rosenberg, American Legion Post No. 883; Michael Bembenek, V.F.W. Post No. 9545; John Churilla, V.F.W. Post No. 8141; Bill Edwards, American Legion Post No. 483; Alonzo Rice, American Legion Post No. 798; Gene Glandon, American Legion Post No. 131; R. Thomas Jaros, American Legion Post No. 18; Laverne Schure, Vorture 796; Ross Campbell, American Legion Post No. 675; Dennis Lockett, Military Order of the Purple Heart; Martin Brennan, American Legion Post No. 1198; Fred Delaney, Amvets Post No. 268; Les Lester, American Legion Post No. 84; Clarence Sandberg, American Legion Post No. 1284; Jom Balcer, Vietnam Veterans of America; Jeffrey Mall, V.F.W. Post No. 7452; Ken Shaver, V.F.W. Post No. 3873; Lou Krause, V.F.W. Post No. 367; John Prescott, American Legion Post, No. 43; Chris Tsilis, V.F.W.—Peotone Post; Conrad Bigos, American Legion; and George Madden, American Ex-Prisoners of War of Fox Valley.

VA DOCTORS DEVELOP SKIN GRAFTING TECHNIQUE

HON. G.V. (SONNY) MONTGOMERY

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to again share with my colleagues news of yet another medical science breakthrough achieved by VA researchers.

As reported in the Salem, VA, Times-Register, two doctors at the Salem VA Medical Center have made great strides in the development of a grafting technique used to replace diseased skin or lesions, and the worldwide medical community has taken notice.

The article, reported by Ms. Terry Monaghan, follows:

[From the Salem (VA) Times-Register, Apr. 19, 1990]

SKIN GRAFTING INNOVATION—DOCTORS AT SALEM VA MAKE BREAKTHROUGH

(By Terry Monaghan)

The Veterans Administration Medical Center in Salem houses two doctors on the staff who have recently made a worldwide impact in their field with the advanced process and application of fibrin glue in the treatment of skin cancer.

VA doctors Ranes Chakravorty, M.D. and Kenneth M. Sosnowski, Ph.D., have been practicing their skin grafting technique for a year and a half. In December, they published an article "Autologous Fibrin Glue in Full-Thickness Skin Grafting" in the December 1989 journal the Annals of Plastic Surgery. The doctors bought reprints and sent out 125 copies of the article to other medical peers worldwide and have more requests for the article daily.

Dr. Chakravorty, who is the Chief of Surgery at the VA and is also a Professor of Surgery at the University of Virginia, has been studying skin grafting for over 30 years. He said that, "the preparation of fibrin is nothing new; it has been produced from blood for 50 years or so and there are tests to check it.

"Fibrin glue is a biological adhesive consisting of fribrinogen and associated serum components that are converted into fibrin by thrombin, calcium choloride, and early fibrinolysis is prevented by adding an "anti-fibrinolytic agent, according to Dr. Chakravorty.

Applying the theory into an applied practical substance was not difficult accoridng to Dr. Chakravorty. "I got with Ken (Dr. Sosnowski is the Chief of Microbiology at the VA) and I told him what I wanted and he did that."

"It's not the end of the world," said Chakravorty, "it's not a wild innovative technique, because skin grafts have been done for many years and fibrin glue has been used some."

There are two types of skin grafting, which is the removal of skin from another area to replace the diseased skin which was removed. The first is a split-skin graft, which is basically the top layer of skin. This piece of skin is not thick, so it is easy to apply but does not withstand pressure of trauma well.

The second type of graft is the full-thickness. The negative side to this technique is the thicker the skin the less likely the chances are of it surviving because the skin is away from its blood supply. The positive sides are that it looks better, and withstands trauma and pressure better.

For areas of the body such as the ears and the tip of the nose, where suturing is technically difficult to perform, the fibrin glue is simply grafting that is an effective technique.

Autologous fibrin glue is simply fibrin glue made from the patient's own blood. This technique was devised by Dr. Chakravorty and Dr. Sosnowski, and this is what sets them ahead of the rest of their field. Fibrinogen can be bought from some blood banks. The fibrin glue is made by using outdated blood, which is listed by the strictest standards set by the blood bank for the freshness of the blood, from the donors and then tested for the HIV virus and hepatitis. This is a costly and sometimes an inefficient process.

When the patient comes for this type of surgery at the VA now, the lab work is done immediately, and the patient is sent to surgery with the Fibrinogen extract and the Thrombin solution. This creates a jelly effect on the surface to receive the graft. The technician spends only an average of 15 minutes in preparing the Fibrinogen.

After the skin lesion is removed, a full-thickness skin graft is obtained and the two solutions are mixed together and applied to the raw surface area with the skin graft applied with some pressure. Following the procedure a bandage is kept on the graft area for five to seven days for protection. After the sixth day the doctor removes the bandage.

"Cosmetic results are pretty good. In some patient you can't even tell and with some you can, because people heal differently," said Chakravorty. "Applied properly, people seem to think it's a pretty neat technique, and there seems to be a lot of interest in it."

"Fibrinogen has been available in Europe and Canada for more than 10 years," said Chakravorty. Canada has not used it for skin grafting as such.

The positive aspect about obtaining the fibrinogen from the patient in making fibrin glue is the fact that the blood is their own, so there are no costly and time consuming tests done on the blood. Also, only a small amount of blood needed for the surgery is taken at a regular doctor's check up.

When the surgery was still considered experimental the doctors had to follow the standard VA procedure for research until approval was granted from the Clinical Executive Board, which is the final board of approval at the hospital. It is now a clinically approved procedure.

Dr. Charkravorty stated that the hospital has performed the surgery more than 100 times and the doctors are beginning to learn new ways to perform the grafting more efficiently.

"The basic thing is that we are doing it from the patients own blood and it is an all outpatient process," said Chakravorty. He received a $1,500 grant from the Veterans Administration to research the fibrin glue grafting.

Dr. Charkravorty's main training is cancer. He is especially interested in cancer of the head and neck area. Skin cancer is very common and creating new treatment processes interests him.

Chakravorty came to the United States in 1952 on an American Medical Association Scholarship. He initially trained in Chicago, then in New York at the Memorial Sloan Kettering Cancer Center and then at the Post Graduate Surgical Division of the University of London at Hammersmith Hospital.

After further training Dr. Chakravorty went back to his home in Calcutta, India. He came to the US to finish his senior residency. Later he worked nine months in Paris and Belgium in their cancer departments. He came to the Medical College of Virginia in July of 1979, and his family joined him in December.

Dr. Chakravorty moved to Salem in 1974 to become the Chief of Surgery at the VA and to receive a position as Professor of Surgery at the UVA Medical Center. His wife of 34 years is Chitra Chakravorty. He also has two children: a son, Agnes Chakravorty who is currently a lawyer in the valley, and a daughter, Aryaa Chakravorty who is an advertising agent with Southern Bell in Jacksonville, Florida.

HERB DAY

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, modern life has brought many conveniences to American consumers. Microwave ovens, drive-in banking, advertising jingles and Big Macs are a part of everyday life—and not just in Southern California! For that reason I want to call the attention of the House to an event scheduled for the morning of May 15 in Santa Barbara. On that day, scores, if not hundreds of community leaders and ordinary people will gather at breakfast to celebrate "Herb Peterson Day."

Herb Peterson may not be a name that springs to the mind of the average man on the street. Nevertheless, that man, as well as the average woman and child, owe a debt to Herb Peterson, for it was Herb who invented the Egg McMuffin, right there in Santa Barbara in 1971!

How, you may ask, does a man come to make such a mark on the landscape of American business and folklore? Well, in Herb's case, it all started on January 5, 1919, which is Herb's birthday. Herb gave little indication of his potential that day, but a clue to his skills did present itself 22 years later, as Herb was helping to put himself through college by washing dishes at the Phi Psi sorority house at Northwestern University. Herb's budding career in the food industry was cut short—you might say "nipped in the bud"—by World War II, when he joined the Marine Corps and saw duty in the Pacific.

Perhaps it was Herb's experience with Navy chow which provided the germ of inspiration for what was to happen 30 years later. Or perhaps it was Herb's marriage in 1946 to Barbara and the subsequent arrival of twin daughters Sally and Susan, followed by Barbie and David.

In any event, to escape the rigors of the working world, Herb went to work as art director at Young and Rubbicam, the famous ad agency. In 1964, Herb was lured away by Darcy Advertising, where he became art director in charge of the McDonald's account. The rest, as they say, is history.

After helping to develop Ronald McDonald into a star, Herb was offered an opportunity by Ray Kroc, McDonald's founder, to escape to Santa Barbara and open a McDonald's, or two, in that seaside oasis. In 1971, inspiration struck Herb, and voila, as Julia Child would say, the Egg McMuffin was born! After a successful test run, the Egg McMuffin was rolled out nationally and eventually revolutionized the fast food industry. To say nothing of the egg-laying industry. McDonald's, thanks to Herb, is now the largest user of eggs in the world.

Well, they say all good things must come to an end, and today Herb is basking in the glow of billions of Egg McMuffins, to say nothing of his and Barbara's 10 grandchildren.

He has not been setting idle however, and for the past 20 years has been lending a hand with many good causes in Santa Barbara, including the Museum of Art, the Zoological Gardens, the Special Olympics, the Santa Barbara Medical Foundation Clinic, the police department, the Council of Christmas Cheer, the Boy's Club, and Santa Barbara City College—where he serves on the advisory board for the Hotel and Restaurant School, along with Julia Child!

They say, Mr. Speaker, that to make an omelet you have to break a lot of eggs—and Herb has certainly done a lot of that. But he's also given a helping hand wherever possible, making life a little brighter—and breakfast a little faster, throughout our community.

So I ask my colleagues to join me, Mr. Speaker, in extending to Herb Peterson our sincere congratulations on a career filled with sunshine, and a life filled with good works, as we celebrate "Herb Day" in Santa Barbara—appropriately enough, at breakfast—on May 15, 1990. Thanks, Herb!

PURGATOIRE RIVER CANYONLANDS

HON. HANK BROWN

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to introduce legislation today which will protect some of our Nation's most valuable and irreplaceable treasures.

After more than 3 years of negotiations, I am introducing the Purgatoire River Canyonlands bill, which directs the Secretary of the Army to transfer the Pinon Canyon Maneuver Site remnant lands to the Secretary of Agriculture for the purpose of protecting the paleontological, archeological, and natural resources on those lands.

Preservation of this land is and always has been the goal of our efforts. The area is home to the world's longest set of dinosaur tracks, Indian pictographs, native fish species, golden eagles, and Colorado bighorn sheep. An historic church and adjacent early Spanish graveyard are located near the canyon's rim. In 1987, after the Army had declared 16,400 acres of the Pinon Canyon Maneuver site as unsuitable for tank maneuvers, we began our quest to preserve the acreage by initiating land exchange talks between the Army and the Forest Service.

When a proposal to swap Forest Service lands in Mississippi for the Army's Pinon Canyon acreage failed to materialize, the overriding need to stablize one of the area's most significant resources, the dinosaur trackway, prompted the introduction of the land transfer legislation. The dinosaur tracks are in danger of continuous erosion. Immediate management of this resource is needed immediately to prevent further deterioration.

Another important component of the legislation is a protection for the people of southeastern Colorado. When Congress approved of the expansion of Fort Carson into the area encompassing Pinon Canyon, the House Armed Services Committee included language in their report authorizing the expansion that prohibited the storage of hazardous or nuclear materials or waste. We want to keep this promise to the people of southeastern Colorado. As the Department of Energy searches for a site to store nuclear waste from Colorado's Rocky Flats Nuclear Weapons Complex, my Purgatoire River Canyonlands legislation will make it clear that this area cannot be considered as an option. The bill specifically prohibits the storage, disposal, or release of waste of any kind within the canyonlands.

The canyon plays an important role in southeastern Colorado's history. It is important for folks to have the opportunity to visit and view the remaining artifacts. It would be in the best interest of cultural preservation and public recreation for the property to be managed by an agency whose sole responsibility is the management of public lands.

INTRODUCTION OF FOREIGN ANTICOMPETITIVE PRACTICES ACT OF 1990

HON. JACK BROOKS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing the Foreign Anticompetitive Practices Act of 1990 to combat a crippling double standard that exists in the antitrust laws to the serious detriment of American businesses and consumers alike. The legislation would ensure that foreign companies are not given any preferential treatment in antitrust cases simply by asserting an often vague and amorphous defense that has come to be known as the foreign compulsion doctrine.

The foreign compulsion doctrine was never created by Congress. It is court-made law that relied on the common law concept of sovereign immunity to insulate government activity from attack under the antitrust laws. But as courts used to make quite clear, antitrust immunity is not to be granted lightly since the competition statutes protect our citizens from competitive harms that tear away at the very fabric of our free enterprise system.

However, in recent years, with the demise of vigorous Federal antitrust enforcement and the abdication of antitrust policy decisions to the State Department, courts have been repeatedly urged by the Justice Department to insulate anticompetitive conduct by foreign firms with little or no showing of actual foreign compulsion to act.

Perhaps, this policy view was motivated by the desire not to humiliate or embarrass foreign countries or their host countries by antitrust suits. But embarrassment and humiliation are weak rationales, to say the least, if their effect is to permit discriminatory treatment against American companies in favor of foreign firms.

Perhaps the most alarming example of this trend was embodied in the infamous Zenith versus Matsushita case—a case involving a predatory pricing conspiracy engaged in by Japanese companies to drive all American manufacturers of color television out of the marketplace in the 1970's. The conspiracy was obviously successful, with only Zenith left as the one U.S.-based television manufacturer. However, when Zenith sued these Japanese companies for their anticompetitive conspiracy, the Justice Department—at the urging of the State Department— actually intervened on behalf of the Japanese defendants and urged the Supreme Court to dismiss the case.

In its 1984 amicus brief, the Justice Department argued that the Japanese companies should be immune from prosecution because they had been directed to act by their host government—the Government of Japan. The Department argued that the so-called foreign compulsion doctrine was applicable, and that all that was required to drop the suit was for the foreign government, either directly or through the State Department, to simply "[inform] the court that the conduct at issue was compelled." In order words, a mere communication to the court from a foreign country would suffice to drop a major antitrust suit that had destroyed an entire American industry and cost American consumers millions of dollars.

My legislation will put an end to such radical and self-destructive notions. At a time when the U.S. marketplace has ceased to be a purely domestic economy, it makes no sense that our courts have reached the anomalous situation of treating foreign-based conspiracies to harm competition differently—and more benignly—than those engaged in by American companies. Certainly, if other countries would extend competitive protections to American companies' activities abroad, then reciprocity of antitrust treatment here in the United States might be in order. But at this time, the current application of the foreign compulsion doctrine is only a one-way street for protecting the anticompetitive behavior of foreign companies.

I would urge the support of this body to correct this flagrant injustice in the application of the antitrust laws.

H.R. 4712, A BILL TO CREATE A NEW FEDERAL DISTRICT IN CALIFORNIA

HON. WILLIAM E. DANNEMEYER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to introduce H.R. 4712, a bill to establish a new judicial district in California to be comprised of Orange, Riverside, and San Bernardino Counties. This bill is similar to H.R. 3163, introduced last August, except that it includes a provision which allows H.R. 4712 to establish a court at a suitable second site to jointly serve the counties of Riverside and San Bernardino, in addition to the original court site of Santa Ana.

This change reflects an intent to establish reasonable access to the Federal courts for the counties of Riverside and San Bernardino. The tri-county, consisting of Orange, Riverside, and San Bernardino Counties, is great in population and area. This bill would not only separate these three counties from the huge central district of California, it would also guarantee that all of the citizens of the tri-county area have reasonable access to a U.S. Federal district court.

Of the four Federal districts in California, the central district is the largest. It represents 51 percent of California's population and serves court. This bill would more evenly distribute the districts in California, reducing the central district's burden to 35 percent of California's residents. The newly created western district would be comprised of 16 percent of the population.

This bill not only looks at today, but tomorrow as well. California's future population distribution can be ascertained by the population increase between 1980 and 1988. During this period, almost 5 million more people became Californians. Approximately one-fourth of those settled in the tri-county area. This bill will assure the future millions of southern Californians better access to the Federal courts.

In addition to this, the caseload of the central district is among the largest nationwide. It leads the Nation in U.S. civil cases commenced, pending, and terminated.

The most egregious characteristic of the central district, however, is the distance that must be traveled by litigants, witnesses, jurors, and attorneys to Federal court. Some tri-county residents must travel over 260 miles one way. That is comparable to driving from Washington, D.C., to New York. These distances, coupled with the congested highways southern California is known for, make participation in the Federal courts burdensome, time-consuming, and an unreasonable alternative to State court.

While Orange County is twice as populous as the other two counties combined, Riverside and San Bernardino Counties span a much greater area than Orange County and are growing in population rapidly. Therefore, it is necessary to give the residents of the tri-county area a new Federal district now. This bill, as amended, will provide the tri-county with the kind of access to the Federal courts that every American should have.

I have attached a copy of the bill for the RECORD.

H.R. —

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. ESTABLISHMENT OF WESTERN DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA.

Section 84 of title 28, United States Code, is amended—

(1) in the first sentence—

A TRIBUTE TO JULIE WILLIS

HON. JERRY LEWIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, in 1982, a bright-eyed preppy came to Washington, DC, sensitive and willing to learn. Even with her confidence, she remained in awe over the big city and indeed, the wonders of the world.

As an intern in the office of her Congressman, Julie began to explore the Nation's Capital and all that makes our Government work. Her first professional responsibility was to serve as receptionist to California Congressman RICHARD LEHMAN. She eventually became executive manager for "Rick's Kids" as she carried out program coordination for an endless string of congressional interns.

Highlighting Julie's stay in Washington was her selection as California's Cherry Blossom Princess and participating in the pomp and pageantry of the 1982 Cherry Blossom Festival. Julie also celebrated her 21st birthday during her Washington tour and Arthur became a part of her life. None of us will ever forget him coming down with "Parvo," or that frantic car ride to the veterinary hospital, and finally a call from Dr. Connell saying "We've saved Arthur." In a very special way, that week reflects the blossoming of a young woman, a growing sense of life's possibilities, and a new level of caring.

Julie came to realize that while there was so much to see and do in this world, there was also much to learn. After working on Capitol Hill, she became convinced that the next chapter in her life's adventure would be school. So, it was back to fundamentals before selecting a final path to conquer the world.

Before turning that page, Julie and her dear friend, Cindy, set a course for the Caribbean for 3 months of water, sun, libation, contemplation, and fun. A friend made during her stay in Aruba suggested a permanent vacation was in order and inspired her to pursue hotel management as a future profession.

It did not take long for San Bernardino Community College at Crafton Hills to learn that Julie was a very special case; there was hardly a course or class in which she was not the Ace. Soon, though struggling a little while applying her God-given talent, she learned that everything is possible to those who will but believe.

After meeting every challenge thrown her way in San Bernardino, Julie became a Red Devil for life at the University of Nevada, Las Vegas. While there, she has been met by success after success and has become one of UNLV's finest.

Mr. Speaker, it is in this spirit of celebration and accomplishment, on the 13th day of our Lord in May 1990, that friends and family will gather together to celebrate the coming out of Julie Willis who, through years of commitment and hard work, will acquire a bachelor of science degree from UNLV's School of Hotel and Restaurant Management.

HONORING JEANNIE DIGGS OF JACINTO CITY, TX

HON. JACK FIELDS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, I was pleased to read recently that one of my constituents, Jeannie Diggs of Jacinto City, TX, has won the prestigious Thomas Jefferson Award which honors individuals in the greater Houston area who demonstrate outstanding public service benefiting their local communities.

Tomorrow, Jeannie and nine other recipients will be presented with bronze medallions at the 13th annual KTRK-TV awards breakfast. All the recipients will appear on channel 13's "Good Morning Houston" show tomorrow.

I have had the good fortune to know and work with Jeannie since I first entered Congress. Jeannie serves as director of Heritage Hall, a senior citizens community center in Jacinto City. It has been my pleasure to visit Heritage Hall and to talk with the seniors who participate in its many activities on numerous occasions.

I've stopped by to discuss issues affecting senior citizens, I've dropped in to offer assistance to individuals who were having problems with the Social Security Administration, and I've even held town meetings there. I can't remember a time when I visited Heritage Hall when Jeannie wasn't there helping her neighbors and friends.

But Jeannie isn't always at Heritage Hall. She recently began a program designed to teach illiterates how to read, and she also inaugurated a volunteer service that delivers meals to home-bound senior citizens in Jacinto City. And for many years, during the Christmas holiday season, Jeannie coordinates a small army of community volunteers who put together and distribute food boxes for needy area residents.

Mr. Speaker, Jeannie is truly one of the "thousand points of light" that President Bush has spoken of: an individual dedicated to making her community better, her neighbors happier, through her own volunteer efforts. Jeannie is a remakable woman who has made a remarkable difference in the lives of a remarkable number of men and women. I hope you will join me by taking this time to thank Jeannie Diggs of Jacinto City for her compassionate and caring work.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

WE DON'T NEED MORE TAXES TO BALANCE THE BUDGET

HON. JOHN J. DUNCAN, JR.

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. DUNCAN. Mr. Speaker, the Federal deficit continues to be of great concern, particularly as the Congress formulates the fiscal 1991 budget.

As we engage in this process, I would refer my colleagues to an article in the April 30, 1990, issue of National Review. Harvard Prof. Lawrence B. Lindsey confirms what the President has said, that a tax increase is not necessary in order to balance the Federal budget.

I urge all my colleagues to read Professor Lindsey's article and examine the facts for themselves.

NO NEW TAXES—THE SURPLUS OF '99

(By Lawrence B. Lindsey)

True or false: To balance the budget in the 1990s we must either increase taxes or cut spending from current levels.

The right answer is "false." If you responded "true," however, I won't take off too many points. There is probably no more widespread myth about the U.S. budget system than the supposed need to raise taxes or cut spending.

Let's consider how the myth got started. We do have a budget deficit of some $160 billion. For the Congress to balance the budget in a single year, it would have to enact some $160 billion in combined tax increases and spending cuts. Since most of our budget is "uncontrollable," in that it is devoted to defense, Social Security, Medicare, and interest on the debt, cutting $160 billion is impossible. So the pundits say we need a major tax increase as well.

The fallacy in this analysis is that no responsible economist would suggest that the United States try to reduce its budget by $160 billion in a single year. The result would almost inevitably be a very sharp recession, or even a depression, as the government desperately sucked spending power out of the economy. Most sensible people favor narrowing the gap by $30 to $40 billion per year, ridding ourselves of the deficit over four or five years. That requires neither raising taxes nor reducing spending below current levels, for the current tax code will automatically provide $75 to $80 billion more in income-tax revenue each year for so long as economic growth continues at its current rate. With an automatic $300-billion revenue increase already scheduled for the next four years, we could increase spending by $140 billion (roughly enough to keep up with inflation) and still bring the deficit down to zero in just four years.

The Congress does not need to raise taxes because taxes are going up anyway. There is no voodoo involved. Both real growth in the economy and continued inflation effectively increase average tax rates and tax revenues over time. In the 1960s Keynesians called this effect a "fiscal drag" or a "fiscal dividend," depending on whether they were advocating more stimulus or arguing that such stimulus was largely self-financing. Table 1 summarizes this relationship for each of the major types of taxes the government collects, in each case showing the effect on tax revenue of a 1 per cent increase in the economy's real output as well as 1 per cent inflation.

TABLE 1.—TAX REVENUE AND THE ECONOMY

Type of tax	Fiscal year 1989 revenue collections [1] (in billions)	Percentage change in revenue with
		1 percent real growth	1 percent inflation
Personal Income	$425	1.3–1.4	1.0–1.1
Corporate Income	107	1.4	1.4
Social Insurance	364	1.0	1.0
Other	80	0.4	0.0

[1] Estimate from Budget of the United States Government fiscal year 1990 for fiscal year 1989.

BRACKET CREEP

Start with the personal income tax. We are all aware of the phenomenon known as bracket creep, by which inflation pushes us into higher tax brackets without our real income increasing. The indexing provisions of the Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981 (ERTA) curbed this highly destructive practice. With indexing, if both your income and prices rise 1 per cent, your tax payments—not your tax rate—will also rise 1 per cent, and taxes will take the same percentage of your income as before. As a general rule, therefore, 1 per cent inflation will cause personal-income-tax revenue to rise only 1 per cent. But because not all parts of the income tax are fully indexed, tax revenues do rise slightly faster than inflation.

Of more importance is what happens when you get a real raise, not just an inflationary increase. Since indexing does not apply to changes in real income, you may be pushed into a higher tax bracket when your income rises. Even if your tax bracket does not change, your tax payments will go up because you will be paying on a larger income. Moreover, your average tax rate will rise because a smaller part of your income will be protected by basic exemptions and deductions.

Consider the case of a four-person family earning $30,000 in 1989. It is allowed an exemption of $2,000 for each person plus a standard deduction of $5,000, for a total of $13,000. Its taxable income is then $17,000. The tax rate on taxable income up to $31,000 is 15 per cent, so this family pays a tax of $2,550, which is 8.5 per cent of its total income, for an average tax rate of 8.5 per cent. Now assume the family's real income increases by 10 per cent, to $33,000. Its deductions are unchanged, so its taxable income rises to $20,000. The tax on $20,000, at the standard 15 per cent rate, is $3,000. The family's tax payments rise 17.6 per cent ($450 on top of $2,550) though the family's income went up only 10 per cent. On average, every 1 per cent rise in the family's income caused a 1.76 per cent rise in its tax payments. The family's average tax rate rose from 8.6 per cent to slightly more than 9 per cent. This increase occurred even though the family remained in the same 15 per cent tax bracket. A greater fraction of the family's income was taxed at the 15 per cent rate, and a smaller percentage at the zero rate. Note that this is not a case of bracket creep, in which inflation increases the rate applied to the same real income: this family is paying a higher average rate because it really is making more money. This is fundamental to any progressive tax code. The family is still better off.

If everyone in the United States got a 10 per cent raise, tax revenues would rise about 15 per cent. Ordinarily this would imply that every 1 per cent of real growth would produce about 1.5 per cent extra revenue. But not all real economic growth can be attributed to salary increases for those currently working; about one-third is due to new workers joining the labor force. New workers add to tax revenues, but they do not produce the same average increase per point of economic growth that occurs when existing workers get higher wages. The actual average effect is thus about 1.3 to 1.4 per cent extra tax revenue per point of economic growth.

INTO THE PIPELINE

Corporate income-tax revenues also rise much faster than the economy, as long as the economy is expanding. Corporations pay a flat tax rate, and so are not subject to bracket creep. But corporate taxes are increased both by inflation and by real growth because of the way that the tax system defines corporate profits.

Imagine the production process as a giant pipeline: raw materials, labor, and capital enter one end, and finished products come out the other. Corporate profits are the difference in value between what goes into the pipeline and what comes out, or the difference between costs and final sales. When the economy slows down, fewer finished products are purchased and items build up in the pipeline, a process known as inventory accumulation. Corporations thus incur the costs of producing the inventory without having any final sales, and corporate profits fall.

When, on the other hand, the economy speeds up, existing items in the pipeline, already largely paid for, are ready to move. Final sales increase faster than input costs, and corporate profits rise quickly.

This "pipeline effect" is most dramatic at turning points in the economy. When the economy turns up or down, corporate profits can easily change as much as 3 to 5 per cent for every 1 per cent change in the economy. As business expansion continues, the ratio drops to about 1.4 points of corporate profit for every point of economic growth. Eventually, rising demand for products can be met only by new investment: the pipeline itself must be expanded in order to accommodate the greater flow of products. This is where the tax system plays a part. Suppose a business invests in expanding the capacity of its pipeline by 10 per cent. We might expect sales, profits, and costs, including capital costs, to rise together in proportion and the capital costs of a 10 per cent larger pipeline also to be 10 per cent higher. But the tax system does not allow corporations to deduct the capital costs of the bigger pipeline immediately; these added costs must be depreciated over many years. Because the costs of the expansion cannot be fully counted, profits appear to rise much more quickly than economic activity expands. Thus corporate profits, and therefore corporate taxes, increase more than point for point with economic activity during periods of real economic growth.

Inflation has a similar effect. Again, consider the goods moving through the pipeline. During periods of inflation, the value of the inventory in the pipeline rises with the general price level. The corporation does not really gain, because the cost of replacing the materials at the beginning of the pipeline also rises. But the tax system views the rising value of inventory as a source of corporate profit. This is particularly true for corporations that use the first-in-first-out (FIFO) method of accounting, under which the cost of products is based on the original cost of materials.

The tax system also fails to take into account the effect of inflation on the capital costs of the pipeline itself. When inflation is high, the depreciation allowances for the cost of the pipeline are far lower than the cost of actually replacing the pipeline at inflated prices. The result, since corporations cannot fully deduct the true capital costs of production from their profits, is an artificial rise in both profits and taxes. All these factors combine to increase corporate tax payments about 1.4 per cent for every 1 per cent increase in the price level. (That 1.4 is a conservative estimate; for the expansions of 1965-9 and 1982-5, the actual figures were 1.6 and almost 1.9.)

Social Security tax payments tend to rise point for point with both real economic activity and inflation, because they are indexed to the price level and have a proportional rather than progressive rate structure. Unless social-insurance tax rates change, these revenues will continue to grow almost exactly as fast as the economy.

Excise taxes, such as those on gasoline, alcohol, and cigarettes, included in "Other" in the table above, are generally levied on a "cents per unit" basis, and so are totally unresponsive to inflation. Sales of goods taxed in this way tend to increase more slowly than the expansion rate of the economy. As a result, revenue from these sources does not rise as fast as overall economic activity. Altogether, however, tax revenues will grow significantly faster than the economy, and this rapid expansion will balance the federal budget if we are at all sensible about spending. The only question is how fast we can expect the economy to grow.

Long-term economic projections are chancy, but let us consider two possibilities. The long-term growth of the U.S. economy since the end of World War II, averaging out recessions and expansions, has been 3.2 per cent year. Though there is no reason to expect that we will do better in the future, there is also no reason to expect that we will do worse. We might reasonably project an average growth of 3.2 per cent over the next twenty years. If we limit our base to more recent years, say from 1981—the peak of the last business cycle—through 1986, which includes the deepest recession we have experienced since the Great Depression, we get an average growth in the economy of only 2.7 per cent per year. Projecting that figure forward would produce what we might call the bearish long-term forecast. The table on this page shows what would happen to revenues with these rates of growth over the next twenty years, assuming inflation continues at the average rate of the past several years, or about 4 per cent. In both cases, revenues grow quickly over time, and an increase of just 0.5 per cent in average real growth adds $530 billion per year by the twentieth year. This is an important indication of just now sensitive the U.S. budget is to continued economic growth.

To reduce the deficit we do not need to cut spending. But we must show some self-control. After all, the Congress could spend every penny collected in revenue and then some. To illustrate the long-term budget needs of the country, the "spending" column in table 2 employes a five-year "flexible freeze" such as President Bush championed during this campaign. The flexible freeze limits spending growth to the level of inflation for five years, then allows real program growth of 2 per cent per year. Thus, program spending rises at a 4.0 per cent annual rate through 1994 and at a 6.1 per cent annual rate thereafter. We assume the interest rate on the national debt, which cannot be frozen, will be about 7.6 per cent annually (that was the average rate of interest paid on outstanding publicly held debt during 1989, according to the 1990 Federal Budget).

TABLE 2.—LONG-TERM FORECAST

[In billions of dollars]

Year	Revenue		Spending [1]	Difference
	3.2 percent	2.7 percent		3.2 percent	2.7 percent
1989	$976	$976	$1,137	$−161	$−161
1994	1,425	1,386	1,382	+43	+4
1999	2,100	1,982	1,752	+347	+230
2004	3,115	2,853	2,142	+973	+711

[1] Data for 1989 from the FY 1990 Budget. It shows $971 billion in program spending and $167 billion in interest. Under this scenario the program spending grows with inflation until 1994 and at inflation plus 2 per cent thereafter. Interest payments are calculated as 7.6 per cent of the outstanding debt and are then added to program spending to get total spending.

This table shows that a tax increase is completely unnecessary. If spending is limited to the growth of inflation until 1994, we will have either a balanced budget (with slow growth) or a $40-billion surplus (with average growth). After 1994, a large surplus arises and begins to grow even though spending is allowed to grow faster than inflation. By 2004 we will be showing annual surpluses of roughly $800 billion and will have paid off the existing national debt.

Of course, this will not happen. Given such enormous revenues, the Congress will try to increase spending. Assuming the freeze holds until 1994, both spending and taxes will be 19.5 per cent of GNP in that year. Over the next 15 years, taxes would automatically grow to between 22.3 and 22.9 per cent of GNP. The Congress could drastically increase the size of government and the government's share of the economy if it appropriated all of the extra tax revenue for that purpose.

Instead, the country should insist on a series of tax cuts in the latter part of the 1990s. The $300-billion surplus forecast for 1999 would easily finance a 15 per cent reduction in tax rates across the board. If the entire surplus were applied to reducing the income-tax rates in the current code, the bottom rate would be reduced from 15 per cent to 10 per cent and the top rate reduced from 28 per cent to 20 per cent. Form 2000, the personal-income-tax code I have proposed [cf. "On the Right," April 16], is designed to produce roughly the same amount of revenue as the current code. So if in the early 1990s we adopted Form 2000 with its single rate of 19 per cent, we would be able to reduce that rate even further in the late 1990s. Assuming we control spending for the next five years, the country will be able to afford substantial tax relief by the end of the century.

NO SLEIGHT OF HAND

All of this may seem magical given the headlines about the government's current fiscal crisis. Yet these calculations do not assume any behavioral changes on the part of the public, or any sharp drop in interest rates, or any unusual rate of economic growth. The only magic involved is the magic of normal economic growth compounded year after year, coupled with permanent restraint on the growth of government spending.

Present-day pundits, stuck in their static analysis of a single year's budget, never calculate the effect of revenue growth on the prospects for the U.S. budget. hence the persistent calls for tax increases. But tax increases would tend to slow the rate of economic growth and reduce future revenue growth. Much better to keep taxes at current rates—or lower them—and assure continued economic growth not only for the Treasury but for all Americans.

FISCAL YEAR 1991 BUDGET RESOLUTION

HON. NORMAN D. DICKS

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. DICKS. Mr. Speaker, I reluctantly supported the budget resolution approved by the House on May 1. I did so in recognition of the need to let the process proceed and to allow the Congress to complete its work in a timely manner this year. I have the greatest respect for the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from California, Mr. PANETTA. I know the difficult task he faced in trying to craft a resolution that can meet Gramm-Rudman targets in a balanced manner and still secure sufficient support to pass the House.

I also recognize that the House budget resolution is only the first step in the process. We will have to reconcile differences with the Senate. And at some point, we will have to reach an accommodation with the President that will allow him to sign appropriations bills and to avoid the reckless slashing of sequestration.

I am convinced that the budget authority level included in the resolution for national defense, as reported, is too low in light of the uncertainty that continues in the world. It is unbalanced in a way that will create serious problems in developing balanced and rational defense authorization and appropriations bills. But I expect that given political realities, that the figure will be adjusted upward by the time the process is completed.

The resolution adopted by the House is $32.8 billion below the baseline level for defense budget authority, or about 10.4 percent. If it is not adjusted later in the budget process, it will require drastic decisions today on major modernization programs including widespread cancellations. These decisions could be difficult, or impossible, to rapidly and cost effectively reverse if favorable international trends do not continue. It will also require force structure cuts, base closing, and reduced operations far in excess of what the administration has proposed, and what I feel this House will be willing to accept.

It is certainly difficult to reach any consensus on a proper figure for defense in the absence of a coherent strategy for the future. But given the fog of the present situation, I am not certain that anyone magically produce such a consensus strategy overnight. That is why I have proposed legislation, H.R. 4383, that would establish an independent commission to work over a 5-year period to initially define, and then refine such a strategy to serve us well into the next century. But for now we have to deal as best we can, and our objective ought to be to foreclose as few options as possible.

The Defense Department has provided a listing of illustrative additional cuts in programs that would be required to meet the figures in this resolution. They include a total cut of another 100,000 military personnel. Force structure cuts could include two more Army divisions, one carrier battlegroup with airwing, a Marine Corps expeditionary brigade, and four more Air Force tactical air wings. The list includes deleting one trident, two SSN-21 submarines, five DDG-51 destroyers, and an LHD ship. The F-15 would be terminated after fiscal year 1990. F-16 production would be reduced. National Guard and Reserve procurement would be cut by $500 million. And the Patriot missile, the SRAM-T, JSTARS and LHX would be terminated. Military construction projects in many States would have to be deleted as well.

It is easy in the abstract to say let's cut defense. But when those of us who have to translate these numbers to real budgets make our decisions, we hear the screams from those who wail, "But we didn't mean cut that." Last year was just a sneak preview of this contradiction. It would occur even if we approved the administration figure. But the threshold of pain under the budget resolution, as reported, would be excruciating.

Instability is, if anything, increasing in the Soviet Union, as evidenced by the escalating crisis in Lithuania. Reports are coming forward that military influence on Gorbachev is growing as the price for acting in the role of domestic enforcer. All this is taking place at a time when 11,000 Soviet nuclear weapons remain targeted on this country.

While remarkable progress has been made in Eastern Europe and I agree that the Warsaw Pact is no longer a viable military organization, these nations have a long way to go before they are stable, economically strong democracies. Romania and Yugoslavia have particular potential to become powderkegs that could reignite world tensions.

At the same time, I agree that the administration budget does not fully reflect the changes that have taken place in the Warsaw Pact, nor the need to strike a proper balance in meeting the painful budget realities of Gramm-Rudman. We can make cuts in the administration request. For this reason I sought the opportunity to offer an amendment to increase the defense function budget authority by $6 billion, to $289 billion. This would still be $17.8 billion below CBO baseline. I expect that the final figure will be close to this number once the process is completed. I did not seek to alter the outlay figure, but my amendment would still have produced a ratio of budget authority to outlay cuts in excess of 2 to 1 in recognition to the need to take steps to begin a reasoned decline in defense spending in the coming years.

However, my amendment was not made in order, and as a result, Members had no opportunity to reflect a position that acknowledges the ability to begin a rational and reasoned reduction in defense spending, while at the same time avoiding precipitous cuts that are based on viewing the world through rose colored glasses. The proper answer to the question of, "Is the cold war over," is not yes or no. It is we hope so, but we don't know yet.

This wait and see attitude is reflected by the American public. In January a CBS-New York Times poll indicated that 48 percent of those surveyed thought defense spending should remain the same, while only 36 percent thought it should decrease. There were even 13 percent who wanted it to increase. A Gallup poll conducted at the same time showed that only 7 percent of the public supported immediate cuts in defense while 78 percent wanted to wait and see.

I intend to work with the leadership of both the House and the Budget Committee as the process proceeds to produce a final budget that will reflect a balanced package that will include significant and rational cuts in defense spending rather than drastic slashing.

S. 2533, FAA CIVIL PENALTY DEMONSTRATION PROGRAM

HON. DENNY SMITH

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. DENNY SMITH. Mr. Speaker, while I acknowledged that the civil penalty program addresses important needs of the FAA, I still have some serious reservations about the fairness of the program.

Under this program, the FAA acts as both prosecutor and judge. This raises the very real possibility of conflict of interest.

The system also places a heavy burden on our Nation's airmen. Airmen that face punishment at the hands of the FAA. This adds further disincentives to remain in general aviation, at a time when we are already suffering from a shortage of qualified personnel.

As we extend this program, we should use this extra time to hold hearings on the concerns raised by many in the aviation industry. While I do not mean to belittle the steps taken by the Administrator to make FAA civil infraction enforcement efforts more responsive, we cannot rely on his good will alone. There must be an independent appeal process to protect the rights of airmen. I look forward to using these hearings to rectify this serious situation.

WHITTEN PRAISED BY COLUMNIST

HON. MIKE ESPY

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. ESPY. Mr. Speaker, on April 8, 1990, a column was published in Mississippi's largest newspaper, the Clarion-Ledger, praising the work of our colleague, Congressman JAMIE WHITTEN. The columnist, Mac Gordon, was right on target when the wrote:

If ever there were a political figure about whom you could honestly say, "he serves the people," it is the opinion here that U.S. Representative JAMIE L. WHITTEN of Charleston fits that description.

It's also the opinion of this Congressman.

Throughout the Magnolia State, we, Mississippians, have benefited from the hard work of Chairman WHITTEN. From Yellow Creek, to Stoneville, to Vicksburg to Jackson and on down to the gulf coast, Chairman WHITTEN'S concern and determination have benefited all of us. I would like to insert into the RECORD some of Mr. Gordon's insights into Chairman WHITTEN'S mark on Mississippi.

The following are portions of Mr. Gordon's column:

Whitten is elected by the residents of Mississippi's First Congressional District, an area of Northeast Mississippi that is bounded by the Tennessee and Alabama lines to the north and east, zigzags, along fringes of the Delta flatland on its western side and falls as far southward as Choctaw County. His geographical district aside, rest assured that in his own mind, Jamie Whitten's "constituency" includes all Mississippians, especially those involved in any form or fashion with agriculture.

You don't have to reside and work in Leland alongside fertile Deer Creek farmlands and in the shadows of one of this country's foremost agricultural research facilities to understand the value, importance and influence of Jamie Whitten on the state and national farm scene, but it sure helps.

Last week at Stoneville, where some of this state's best and brightest gather each morning to conduct the highest scientific levels of ag research, another top official came from Washington's Department of Agriculture to view the proceedings of this unique Mississippi think tank located in what many call "Jamie Whittenland." They do this from time to time, bureaucrats and politicans alike, to see what's new in the research fields just outside Leland.

This time it was Charles E. Hess, an assistant secretary of agriculture who is responsible for general supervision of the USDA's Agricultural Research Service. Hess toured private and public research units in the area, helped a press conference with local reporters and briefed scientists on what's ahead in new research programs and the chances for their funding. He made sure that Whitten's name got mentioned several times in his presentations. No one had to ask afterward just who it is in Congress that is considered agriculture and ag research's "best friend."

It didn't hurt matters any that a large part of Hess's time was spent in the "Jamie Whitten Delta State Research Center" at Stoneville where USDA-ARS laboratory research projects take place. And of course, there was the requisite group photo of Hess and local and state research leaders in front of the bronze Whitten bust in the lobby of the building—one of the few federal edifices named in honor of a still-serving congressman.

All of that may sound like puff, but truth is that the five-story research building, the bust and all the talk of gratitude for Congressman Whitten's positive attitude toward agriculture are tangible signs of the reverence in which he is held in the farm belt.

Work is presently under way in Washington on a new Farm Bill, and when all the various discussions and requests near the action stage are over, it is likely that one member of Congress will wield far more influence over the final measure's language than anyone else in the decisions-making process.

Jamie Whitten isn't called "The Chairman" for nothing.

As a fellow Congressmen from Mississippi, it is my honor to serve with Chairman WHITTEN.

UNNECESSARY LUGGAGE ON A SPECIAL AND FOCUSED BILL

HON. AMO HOUGHTON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. HOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, the House voted to go to conference with the Senate today. The purpose is to resolve differences between the two versions of the supplemental appropriations bill. I would like to add a thought about the process.

When the bill came before the House I supported it. It provided assistance to Panama and Nicaragua. It helped programs which are running out of funding—programs such as veterans' medical care, disaster assistance, unemployment assistance, and others.

When the bill reached the Senate, several nongermane amendments were added. One of them surely will draw a Presidential veto. Although I might support these amendments based on their own merits, I now oppose them since they are unnecessary luggage on this special and focused bill.

I have introduced a resolution this Congress which has 158 cosponsors. The resolution prohibits long-term continuing appropriations bills which usually become bogged down with nongermane issues—the very issues illustrated by this bill.

I have not met a man or woman in the House who thinks privately that huge grab bag bills constitute a responsible way to handle taxpayer money. There is no way to separate the good from the bad. My resolution would not apply to supplemental appropriations bills such as this, yet perhaps there will be a way to include them in years to come. But the same principle applies, and here today we should be able to vote for or against a provision based on its own merit, rather than resorting to these kind of camouflage tactics.

TRIBUTE TO CALDWELL COUNTY (KY) HIGH SCHOOL STUDENTS

HON. CARROLL HUBBARD, JR.

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. HUBBARD. Mr. Speaker, in this day and age when most young people are more concerned with rock and roll and MTV, I am proud to say that a group of young people from my western Kentucky district have distinguished themselves as being actively involved in learning about our Nation's heritage.

This weekend, a group of students from Caldwell County High School in Princeton, KY, will be in Washington to represent Kentucky in the "National Bicentennial Competition on the Constitution and the Bill of Rights—We the People * * * Congress and the Constitution."

These students have spent a great deal of time studying the basic ideas and philosphies of the framers of the constitution, how the constitution was written, as well as how and why our Government was organized. They have discussed the theories behind the separation of powers and how our system of checks and balances works.

Perhaps most importantly, their studies have emphasized the importance of the role and responsibility of the citizens in a democracy.

Perhaps most importantly, their studies have emphasized the importance of the role and responsibility fo the citizens in a democracy.

I am very proud of these students and their achievements. I salute their efforts, along with those of their teacher, Roy Gene Rogers.

I am confident that through their exposure and participation in this program these young people will be better prepared to assume their role and responsibility as future citizens in this great democracy we know as the United States of America.

MARYLAND CITY ELEMENTARY SCHOOL CELEBRATES ITS 25TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. C. THOMAS McMILLEN

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. McMILLEN of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize a tradition of excellence in education in Anne Arundel County, MD. This week the Maryland City Elementary School celebrates its 25th anniversary, and I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the citizens, students, and teachers in Maryland City for their years of dedication and commitment.

To symbolize this commitment, the citizens of Maryland City will dedicate a new media center at the elementary school to Anna Jean Tobin, a devoted educator who served as principal of the school for 17 years. The attractiveness of this school and community is displayed by the fact that adults who attended Maryland City Elementary as children have settled in the area, and now send their own children to the school. This tradition is also embodied in two people who have worked at the school during the past 25 years: Leslie Gwynn and Merle Watts.

Through groups such as the Parent Teacher Organization and the Maryland City Civic Association, the community and the school have grown together. On their 25th anniversary, I commend Maryland City Elementary and the people who have built this community and school, and wish them the best for the next 25 years.

A BILL TO EXTEND MEDICAID PRESCRIPTION DRUG COVERAGE TO ALL LOWER INCOME SENIOR CITIZENS

HON. FORTNEY PETE STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to introduce the Medicare Buy-In Prescription Drug Coverage Act of 1990. This bill would require State Medicaid programs to extend prescription drug coverage to lower income senior citizens.

This bill is a companion to H.R. 4034, a bill that I introduced earlier this year to extend the Medicare buy-in provisions to beneficiaries with incomes up to 133 percent of the Federal poverty level by January 1, 1993.

The Medicare Buy-In Prescription Drug Coverage Act of 1990 would require State Medicaid programs to cover prescription drugs for all individuals who qualify for the buy-in provision.

The Medicare Catastrophic Coverage Act, Public Law 100–360, enacted in 1988, required States to buy Medicare coverage for all poor elderly and disabled individuals. This provision, intended to provide substantial protection to the neediest Medicare beneficiaries, was retained while other Medicare benefits were repealed.

This Medicare buy-in provision of Public Law 100–360 required States to pay Medicare premiums, deductibles, and coinsurance for all elderly and disabled Medicare beneficiaries with incomes below the Federal poverty level.

Medicare beneficiaries who qualify for buy-in coverage receive Medicare benefits without spending a substantial portion of their limited income for Medicare copayments.

While the buy-in provision offers considerable protection for low-income beneficiaries, it does not help pay for benefits—such as prescription drugs—that are not covered by the Medicare Program.

As a result, individuals who qualify for the new buy-in provision typically lack coverage for outpatient prescription drugs and must pay for their drugs out-of-pocket.

With passage of its companion bill H.R. 4034, this bill would assure that all Medicare beneficiaries with incomes up to 133 percent of the Federal poverty level are eligible for prescription drug coverage offered by State Medicaid programs to other title XIX beneficiaries.

Lack of prescription drug coverage is of particular concern for low-income seniors—especially those with multiple chronic conditions—who spend a substantial portion of their income for life saving medications.

According to the Department of Health and Human Services' [DHHS] May 1989 Report to Congress, "Expenses Incurred by Medicare Beneficiaries for Prescription Drugs," low-income beneficiaries use more prescription drugs and spend more for prescription drugs than the average beneficiary:

Medicare beneficiaries living under the Federal poverty level used more prescription drugs than individuals in higher income groups;

Medicare beneficiaries living under the Federal poverty level spend 14 percent more than the average Medicare beneficiary for prescription drugs; and

More than 12.4 percent of Medicare beneficiaries below the poverty line had expenditures in excess of $700.

The DHHS Report, based upon data from the National Medical Expenditure Study, found that Medicare beneficiaries with Medicaid coverage obtained more prescription drugs than those with only Medicare coverage. This finding supports the value of the proposed expansion of Medicaid prescription drug benefits to this population.

Among the severely disabled elderly, the financial burden of prescription drug coverage is even more alarming. According to a report issued by the Urban Institute, "Severely Disabled Elderly Persons With Financially Catastrophic Health Care Expenses," based upon data from the National Long-Term Care Channeling Demonstration project, out-of-pocket prescription drug expenses are particularly burdensome for lower-income severely disabled elderly persons.

The Urban Institute report found that prescription costs accounted for over 56 percent of out-of-pocket expenses for severely disabled senior citizens.

Severely disabled individuals below the poverty level, with prescription drug expenses, spent on average 66 percent of their income out-of-pocket for their medical care. This compares to 40 percent spent by severely disabled individuals above the Federal poverty level.

Mr. Speaker, with the rising cost of prescription drugs and the lack of drug coverage under the Medicare program, this bill would provide substantial assistance to the most vulnerable senior citizens living below or near the Federal poverty level.

I urge my colleagues to join in support of this bill to extend Medicaid prescription drug benefits to all lower-income Medicare beneficiaries.

TRIBUTE TO JOHN M. "MAC" AICHELE

HON. GEORGE W. GEKAS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask my colleagues to join me in recognizing a Pennsylvanian whose accomplishments and contributions to the community are indeed exemplary.

John M. "Mac" Aichele is an example of the spirit of community service. He is retired president and former chairman of the board of the Milton S. Hershey School in beautiful Hershey, PA. This school was founded to provide a home and academic training to orphaned boys. The tradition of dedication to others has continued through the years as countless boys and more recently, girls, have been educated on the school's sprawling campus.

In addition to overseeing the education of his students, Mac has been involved with a long list of organizations, including the Harrisburg Community Threatre, the Hershey Symphony Orchestra Association, the M.S. Hershey Foundation, and the Dauphin County Mental Health/Mental Retardation Board. He currently serves as treasurer of the Mental Health Association of Cumberland, Dauphin, and Perry Counties, and on the boards of the Boy Scouts of America, Family and Children's Service, and Ronald McDonald House.

Clearly, Mr. Speaker, Mac is one of the "points of light" on which our Nation depends. His selflessness represents the very vest that we can be. On behalf of my constituents, I thank him for his work.

CONTINUED UNITED STATES ECONOMIC SUPPORT FOR NICARAGUA DEPENDS ON ALL PARTIES' COMPLIANCE WITH PEACE ACCORDS

HON. RONALD D. COLEMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. COLEMAN of Texas. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the House Appropriations Subcommittee on Foreign Operations and Export Financing, which has jurisdiction over United States foreign military and economic assistance, I rise to bring to the attention of my colleagues an extremely serious situation that is developing in Nicaragua today: The very real threat from the right and the left to the newly elected government of Violetta Chamorro.

The outgoing Sandinista government and the Chamorro administration have successfully completed the transfer of power and are prepared to go forward in a normal political relationship under a democracy, of government and opposition under the law. While I personally found much of the Sandinista legacy to be distasteful and repressive, the Bush administration certified that election to be fair and open, and as a result the Sandinista Party has finally achieved a measure of electoral legitmacy. At this time, however, the disarmament and demobilization of the contras are essential to peace and stability in Nicaragua.

Arrangements for this demobilization have been made to take place under the supervision of the United Nations and Cardinal Miguel Obando y Bravo, the archibishop of Managua. The Contra leaders themselves formally agreed to these arrangements on April 18, 1990 in what is being called the Toncontin Agreement, which was a follow-on to the original Toncontin agreements regarding the demobilization of the Contras in Honduras. The Contras have since left their sanctuaries in Honduras and moved into designated enclaves inside Nicaragua. According to the demobilization arrangements, they are to remain peacefully in those enclaves while the Nicaraguan Army has pulled back a stipulated distance, until the process of disarmament is completed on June 10.

It was upon all these premises that the House of Representatives voted recently to provide Nicaragua with $300 million in economic assistance. So it is all the more alarming to learn that Contra leaders have been discussing publicly the possibility of going back on their word. There are indications that the Contras are considering not disarming by June 10. Interviews given in to the Nicaraguan press by Contra leaders discuss the possibility of declaring the enclaves to be liberated zones. Equally disturbing, there are reports that the Contras have access to large caches of arms in northern Nicaragua and in Honduras as well as of former Contra leaders leaving the United States and returning to the field in Nicaragua.

At the same time, the United States should be concerned by reports that the Sandinistas are making equally destabilizing threats. They have threatened to shut down the Government, as well as having handed out enormous raises to party workers in the Government bureaucracy. While it is imperative that the Contras disband and demobilize, it is equally critical that the Sandinistas continue to relinquish control of the army and behave responsibly as the transition to democracy takes place, and that includes an end to the threats of staging strikes that would cripple the economy.

Mr. Speaker, I want to send the message loud and clear to all political factions in Nicaragua—the Sandinistas, the Contras, members of the UNO coalition, and the Chamorro government—that the United States Congress fully expects the letter and the spirit of the Toncontin Agreement to be upheld. We are keeping a close eye on the situation and on the activities of all parties concerned. Any breach of the Toncontin Agreements will surely threaten all United States assistance to Nicaragua, including the $300 million in this year's supplemental appropriations bill for agricultural and transportation assistance as well as aid being considered for fiscal year 1991. Many of us are prepared to consider tough restrictions or even an outright suspension of United States assistance to Nicaragua if the Contra demobilization does not take place on schedule and if the Toncontin Agreement is not upheld by all parties concerned.

Mr. Speaker, it is the stated and formal policy of the United States to support the government of Violetta Chamorro. This government is under heavy pressure from all sides. We must let all parties concerned know that the $300 million in U.S. aid in this fiscal year and possible additional aid in the next depends upon the upholding of the Toncontin Agreement and the prompt and complete demobilization of the Contras. Anything less will be considered to be a breach of enormous magnitude, and the consequences will be suffered accordingly.

TRIBUTE TO WALLY PIEKARSKI

HON. WILLIAM O. LIPINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. LIPINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to recognize the outstanding contributions of Wally Piekarski to the Chicago community. On June 1, 1990, Mr. Piekarski will be honored by the Chicago Park District for his 35 years of dedicated service.

Mr. Piekarski started as a physical instructor with the Chicago Park District in 1955. He then emerged as a leader and initiator of a variety of athletic programs for the city's youth. Some of these programs provided athletic programs to children who would normally not have these opportunities.

He also worked for the Park District as playground supervisor and was later recognized for his extraordinary organizational skills. He was soon appointed tennis director and distinguished himself by arranging for Chicago to host, for the first time, the National Public Parks Tennis Championships in 1969. The success and excellence of this event brought the championships back to Chicago to host the 50th anniversary of the tournament in 1976.

In recognition of his accomplishments for organizing these tournaments, Mr. Piekarski received the Tennis Director of the Year Award in 1976 by the Chicago District Tennis Association and the Service Award in Tennis in 1983, which was presented by Billie Jean King. His exemplary contributions to Chicago's tennis association were honored with the Chicago Park District Tennis Association Service Award in 1987.

In light of his outstanding accomplishments and contributions to the Chicago community, I call upon my colleagues to join in honoring Mr. Wally Piekarski.

IN RECOGNITION OF THE 35TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE 103RD INFANTRY VETERANS ASSOCIATION OF WORLD WAR II

HON. JOSEPH E. BRENNAN

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. BRENNAN. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I rise today to honor the 103rd Infantry Veterans Association of World War II on its 35th reunion May 5.

This regiment was part of the Maine National Guard when it was inducted into Federal service in February 1941. During World War II, the 103rd Infantry served in the South and Southwest Pacific, the Philippines, and Japan. While in the Philippine Islands, the 103rd Regimental Combat Team was cited for outstanding performance of duty in action against the enemy.

As a fellow veteran, I take great pride in congratulating the 103rd Infantry Veterans Association on this special occasion.

THE FOSTER GRANDPARENT PROGRAM OF ENTERPRISE, AL

HON. WILLIAM L. DICKINSON

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, the year 1990 marks the 25th anniversary of the Foster Grandparent Program nationwide. The Foster Grandparent Program [FGP] sponsored by the Human Resource Development Corp., in Enterprise, AL, has been serving the Second District of Alabama since 1981.

The program was expanded to include Ft. Rucker Army Aviation Center, making it one of five FGP's nationwide that serves the special needs of children on military bases. Now they have had many requests from people throughout the wiregrass region to expand the program throughout the second district. They are now pursuing this request and hope to make this a reality in the near future.

In 1989, the local FGP provided 77,414 hours of service to children with problems in their development. At this time, they are providing services and volunteer opportunities to 100 senior adults in three counties.

This organization receives Federal funds through ACTION national volunteer agency under the Older American Volunteer Programs [OAVP], while the State of Alabama provides some funding through the Alabama Association of Retired Senior Volunteer Programs [AARSVP]. Also, donated funds are received each year from local governments, clubs, churches, organizations, and individuals.

The FGP is one of the most respected and well known volunteer efforts in the United States. Through the FGP, low-income and non-stipended overincomed people—60 years of age and older—provide person-to-person service to children with exceptional needs.

In light of a growing senior population, we should realize the importance of providing opportunities like this to assist aging Americans in remaining active and healthier throughout their lifetime. The Foster Grandparent Program has served this purpose well in the Second District of Alabama.

HELP STAMP OUT BREAST CANCER

HON. BARBARA BOXER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Speaker, over 40,000 women died last year as a result of breast cancer. According to the American Cancer Society, over 150,000 women will be diagnosed with breast cancer this year. Breast cancer is second only to lung cancer as the leading killer of women in this country. Yet, many women are unaware of the steps they can take to detect this deadly disease early, when the survival rate for victims is greatly increased.

I am very pleased to join in a national effort to publicize the importance of regular breast self examination and mammography screening or breast x rays to reducing the cancer death rate.

The American Medical Association, the American Cancer Society, and the National Cancer Institute recommend that asymptomatic women between the ages of 40 and 49 undergo an annual clinical breast examination by their doctor, and mammograms every 2 years. Beginning at age 50, both clinical examinations and mammograms should be performed yearly.

In addition, women of all ages should examine themselves for lumps a day or two after menstruation, keeping in mind that 8 out of 10 lumps are benign. Nonetheless, women should report anything suspicious to their doctor.

Unfortunately, the majority of women do not comply with these life saving measures. Only an estimated 15 to 40 percent of women examine their own breasts each month, and compliance with mammographies is only 15 percent among women of all ages.

I am here to tell the women of this Nation that mammography screening is painless, and delivers less radiation than a mouth x ray. If every woman at risk in this country had a mammogram, then the breast cancer death rate could be reduced by 30 percent, and what a monumental improvement that would be.

THE PEE DEE SPEECH AND HEARING CENTER

HON. ROBIN TALLON

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. TALLON. Mr. Speaker, May is "Better Speech and Hearing Month," a time for all Americans to appreciate the ability to communicate, as well as time to reach out to those who cannot.

The Pee Dee Speech and Hearing Center is a nonprofit organization committed to this ideal throughout the year. The Sixth District is fortunate to have the services of this center which provides audiology, speech pathology, and language services, regardless of ability to pay.

Associated with the United Way, the center is the only nonprofit speech and hearing organization accredited in South Carolina. In fact, it was the very first facility of any kind to be accredited in South Carolina.

More than 24 million Americans must live with hearing and speech impairments. While these physical impairments might range from slight to severe, their effect on an individual's life often causes isolation and loneliness.

I applaud the success of the Pee Dee Speech and Hearing Center in helping affected citizens overcome speech and hearing difficulties.

BUREAUCRATIC INDIFFERENCE

HON. BEN NIGHTHORSE CAMPBELL

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. CAMPBELL of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, to be accused of bureaucratic indifference is as insulting a curse as can be leveled upon a Federal agency. Yet, the understaffed and overworked Social Security Administration is burdened by regulations which oftentimes prevent it from escaping this label.

Take, for example, the case of 13-year-old Jeffrey Zangaris, a profoundly retarded cerebral palsy victim whose mother is being denied SSI payments because the Social Security Administration cannot count against her $1,600 per month gross income the $700 per month medical bills necessitated by Jeffrey's condition.

An administrative law judge in Colorado saw the inequity in this situation, and ruled Ms. Zangaris eligible for SSI payments. He based his decision on language in the Social Security Act which allows the Secretary to allow certain exclusions from income in cases in which it would be inequitable to do otherwise.

His ruling, however, was overturned. The reason: that the Secretary has no authority to make such exclusions in a case-by-case basis, and that there is no allowance for the exclusion of medical expenses in the deeming of income.

I think it is clear to anyone that a single mother trying to raise two children, one of whom is severely handicapped, on $900 per month net income is deserving of more than just praise for her courage. Ms. Zangaris is clearly deserving of the type of assistance that the SSI program was originally designed to provide, yet she has been repeatedly denied payments due to the inflexibility of current law.

It has been suggested that she institutionalize her son, at three times the cost to the Federal Government as SSI payments, but his last experience in an institution nearly killed him.

I am in the process of exploring avenues of assistance for Ms. Zangaris as she struggles to keep her family together. I, like she, am looking for support from Members who recognize the inequity in Jeffrey Zangaris' situation. As I seek to develop a legislative remedy to this problem, I would appreciate the input of any Members who know of similar situations. Together, maybe we can help families caught in this kind of pinch to receive the assistance they need and deserve.

TRIBUTE TO MARTHA DABNEY PETERSON

HON. DONALD M. PAYNE

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. PAYNE of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, tomorrow, May 4, marks a special day for my constituent, Mrs. Martha Dabney Peterson of East Orange, as she celebrates her 100th birthday.

Mrs. Peterson was born in Richmond, VA, on May 4, 1890. She spent many years as a resident of Newark, NJ, before moving to East Orange where she has resided for 20 years.

Mrs. Peterson is an outstanding person who has been an active member of her church since 1919, generously contributing her time and talents.

Mr. Speaker, I know my colleagues here in the U.S. House of Representatives join me in extending congratulations and very best wishes to Mrs. Peterson on this happy occasion.

HONORING KEW GARDENS SYNAGOGUE ADATH YESHURUN

HON. GARY L. ACKERMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to the Kew Gardens Synagogue Adath Yeshurun, which will mark its golden jubilee with a dinner dance on May 13 at the Beth Sholom Synagogue in Lawrence, NY.

The Kew Gardens Synagogue is one of the oldest Jewish congregations in the central Queens area of New York City. Those who establish the synagogue came from many different ethnic backgrounds, including many who escaped the Holocaust in Europe and were able to come together to establish a congregation that has been a place of prayer and charity for the past 50 years. In that time the synagogue has witnessed its congregation grow from a modest 14 congregants to its now thriving community of 380 active members.

The Kew Gardens Synagogue throughout its 50-year history has been more than a house of worship. Founded by the late David Levine, it has fulfilled the need for community services for Jews and gentiles alike. The services the synagogue provides to the community include a nursery school, youth activities such as little league baseball and sports programs for all children, sabbath youth groups, educational and cultural programs for men and women, including study groups and cultural lectures given by reputed individuals from outside the synagogue. The synagogue has also developed special programs to support single parent families, and assist recent immigrants from the Soviet Union in adapting to life in the United States.

The many programs and activities were expended through the years under the stewardship of many dedicated men and women. I would especially like to honor: board of trustee members David Weil, Richard Koppel and Arnon Hiller; Vice-Presidents Gregory Binkiewicz and Hymen Arbesfeld; Treasurer Eli Mirzoeff; Financial Secretary Noah Diamond; Correspondence Secretary Simon Mietles; and Recording Secretary Nathan Reahimi for their timeless dedication over the years to the Synagogue and the Kew Gardens community. At present, the synagogue is led by President Fred Friedman in partnership with Rabbi Dr. Barnard Rosenweig, the spiritual leader of the Kew Gardens Synagogue. These men, with the help of the other members of the synagogue, have worked diligently to adapt to the ever changing needs of the Kew Gardens community.

The Kew Gardens Synagogue has survived many trials and tribulations during its first half century, but it has survived and prospered as a place the community turns to in times of joy and need. I would like to ask my colleagues to join me in congratulating Kew Gardens Synagogue Adath Yeshurun on its 50th anniversary and to extend the hope that the next 50 years will be as successful as its first.

FEDERAL EMPLOYEE OF THE YEAR

HON. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, today I would like to recognize the 25th Annual Federal Employee of the Year Awards Program. This is deserved recognition for those Federal employees who have made a tremendous effort to promote public service in the greater Miami area. Although all Federal employees warrant commendation for their service, these people have gone beyond the call of duty to demonstrate outstanding job performance.

The ceremony will take place at noon on Friday, May 11, 1990. Last year's ceremonies drew a crowd of over 700 and this year over 800 people are expected to gather at the Radisson Mart Plaza to participate in the event.

The chairperson of the Federal Employee of the Year Awards Program is Haydee Ferrer, who has done a superb job in organizing the ceremony and the Employee of the Year Luncheon which will be held prior to the presentation of the awards. Also adding fruitful efforts to the event is Ms. Cary G. Riusech, program coordinator for the program. Due to Ms. Riusech and Ms. Ferrer's efforts, I am sure the events will be extremely successful.

After a complex and competitive qualifying process, I would like to acknowledge and congratulate the following people who have received nominations for Federal Employee of the Year in the Miami Division. The nominees are Mr. Jacinto Acebal, Mr. Ruben Abella, Ms. Patsy P. Banks, Mr. Carlos [Pepe] Cordero, Mr. Francisco E. Ferrer, and Ms. Rosetta D. Fulmore.

Also nominated are Mr. Stanley M. Gold, Mr. Carolos Gonzalez, Mr. Juan C. Gonzalez, Ms. Karon P. Grunwell, Ms. Lourdes Hormilla, Mr. Rolando D. Jiminez, Ms. Dorothy Johnson, Mr. John Pedersen, Ms. Maria Elena Perez, and Mr. Clyde Young.

I commend the organizers of the program and the nominees for Employee of the Year for their outstanding work. This is a splendid opportunity to recognize those who have displayed great ability and determination in the field of public service.

ADMINISTRATION EXPORT CONTROL PROPOSAL IS A TROJAN HORSE

HON. RON WYDEN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. WYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I am concerned that the proposal the administration released yesterday to streamline export controls on dual-use items is a smokescreen meant to divert Congress from making fundamental reforms through legislation.

The administration said its proposal would modernize Cocom export control on telecommunications products, computers, machine tools, and other dual-use items. While the proposal was presented as a major reform of the export control system, it falls short of even the China green line level of technology for both telecommunications and computers.

It seems more than a coincidence that this proposal came just a day before the House Foreign Affairs Committee planned to mark up its reauthorization of the Export Administration Act. It looks to me like a Trojan horse meant to head off more far-reaching reforms in Congress.

The administration proposal would decontrol computers up to half the China green line level of technology, a processing data rate [PDR] of 275 megabits per second [mps], while computers up to the China green line, a PDR of 550 mps, destined for civilian uses will get favorable licensing treatment.

At least one major U.S. computer company introduced this level of technology back in 1966. The administration is saying it's willing to sell 25-year-old computers to Eastern Europe under certain conditions. This defies reality when you can put a more powerful desktop computer in the back of a truck and drive it through what used to be the Berlin Wall.

Similarly, the administration's proposal to allow exports of fiber optic equipment to a transmission rate of 156 megabits to Eastern Europe, under certain conditions, is equally outdated.

The current standard for Western Europe is 565 megabits. The administration proposal will retard the political and economic integration of Eastern and Western Europe by prolonging incompatible telecommunications systems.

In addition, the administration plan appears to offer no significant reform in telecommunications exports to the Soviet Union, even though the free flow of information can only help to speed democratic political development in that country.

The one glimmer of hope—in addition to some significant reform on machine tools—is the administration's promise to develop a core list of fewer items that should be controlled. I fully agreed with this approach.

Given the dramatic changes in the world, a compelling argument can be made that the benefits outweigh the risks of eliminating national security controls under the Export Administration Act on all dual-use items other than state-of-the-art semiconductor manufacturing equipment, state-of-the-art supercomputers, goods for sensitive nuclear uses, and militarily critical arrays of design and manufacturing know-how. I think we should look at this concept during consideration of legislation to reauthorize the Export Administration Act when it reaches the floor later this year.

STATE DEPENDENT CARE DEVELOPMENT AMENDMENTS OF 1990

HON. THOMAS J. TAUKE

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. TAUKE. Mr. Speaker, today, I am introducing the "State Dependent Care Development Amendments of 1990" upon request of President Bush.

This program provides funds to States for the planning, development, establishment, expansion, or improvement of dependent care services. Currently 40 percent of the funds must be used for resource and referral for all types of dependent care services ranging from child care to elder care. The remaining 60 percent must be used to develop and expand school-age before and after school care.

The bill I am introducing today will make two changes to current law, allowing for even greater flexibility for States. First, this legislation would remove the required 60–40 split. Given that the program was established in 1984, there may come a time in the next few years when States have a well developed resource and referral system and may not need to allocate 40 percent of their funds to maintain it. This removal of the 60–40 split would allow them to devote more funds to the continued development of care for children who would otherwise remain unsupervised before or after school.

The second change involves broadening categories of entities who may receive grants under this act as well as the allowable settings where programs can be established. Currently, programs may only be funded at public or private schools and community centers. This legislation would open the door to participation by other entities in the community including places of employment, libraries, hospitals, churches, family child care providers, and even public entities like a county council building.

As the need for child care continues to grow, appropriations for this program will likely follow suit. It is vital that it is structured in a way that will provide as many options as possible for families who need day care provided outside of the home.

BUDGET RESOLUTION, 1991

HON. EDWARD F. FEIGHAN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday, May 1, the House of Representatives approved House Concurrent Resolution 310, the budget resolution for fiscal year 1991. This resolution sets sound priorities, makes tough choices, and puts America back on the right track.

I voted for the budget resolution for several reasons but first and foremost because of the significant deficit reduction that would be achieved. House Concurrent Resolution 310 calls for $36 billion in real cuts and meets this year's Gramm-Rudman target of $64 billion. This type of pay-a-you-go approach would restore fiscal sanity to the Federal budget. Though I believe we must make deeper cuts, House Concurrent Resolution 310 is a good first step.

In addition, this resolution returns fiscal honesty to the Federal budget process as it begins to move the Social Security trust fund off budget where it belongs. By 1995, House Concurrent Resolution 310 would balance the Federal budget without raiding the trust fund—a big victory for America's seniors.

I am also proud to support a budget which takes into account the revolutionary changes throughout the world. These changes allow us to redirect our focus and begin to address national security issues here at home such as the budget deficit, the declining quality of America's education system, the devastation of our environment, our inability to compete in the global marketplace, and our inability to end the drug crisis.

In January, I was somewhat surprised with President Bush's budget proposal as it not only made no mention of a peace dividend, but actually called for increased defense spending. House Concurrent Resolution 310 finds the peace dividend, and does so without dismantling our national defense. The defense cuts—$32.8 billion from budget authority, $11.5 billion in outlays, and a 25-percent reduction over 5 years—are reasonable and mandatory if we want to rebuild this Nation.

This budget's priorities are right on the money. It provides $2.5 billion for education over and above inflation for important programs such as dropout prevention, Pell grants, math and science programs, handicapped and compensatory education, ignoring cuts proposed in the Bush budget. The resolution also increases our investment in America's infrastructure, medical and scientific research, and environmental protection.

At the same time, House Concurrent Resolution 310 reaffirms our commitment to those less fortunate in American society. The resolution provides $3 billion more to expand housing assistance and to rehabilitate and construct affordable housing. In addition, this budget preserves the Medicare Program and blocks the deep cuts offered by the Bush budget. House Concurrent Resolution 310 also provides full cost-of-living-adjustments for Federal and military retirees, two groups left out in the cold by the President's budget.

Considering the many competing priorities, I commend the Budget Committee for crafting a well-balanced budget. I urge President Bush to join us in support of this resolution. Together we must get to work on the agenda for the 1990's.

TRIBUTE TO ROSA PARKS

HON. WILLIAM J. HUGHES
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 3, 1990

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I stand here today and pay tribute to a woman of unwavering conviction and remarkable courage. I salute the mother of the modern civil rights movement, Mrs. Rosa Parks, not only for her refusal to give up her bus seat on that December 1, 1955, but for her refusal to give up her vital role in the civil rights movement as it continues to be fought every day. Mrs. Parks said "No" to the discrimination of blacks everywhere, and that stunning rejection of the status quo has since then contagiously affected millions of blacks and whites alike.

Her example triggered the boycott of the Montgomery bus system, and involved a little known group led by the late Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr. Within a year, the Supreme Court outlawed the segregation of city buses in Montgomery and one of the first battles in the civil rights movement was won. Mrs. Parks may have lost her job as a result of demanding equal treatment, but she gained a calling instead.

Mrs. Rosa Parks has been actively working to ensure the fair treatment of millions of blacks since even before that infamous day. Born in Tuskegee, AL, but raised in Montgomery, Mrs. Parks worked as a youth adviser for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, and was affiliated with a number of other campaigns that sought to rectify racial injustices, including the Scottsboro Boys case. She has aided my distinguished colleague, Congressman JOHN CONYERS, where she worked for 23 years. Today, though retired, she continues to serve others through the Rosa and Raymond Parks Institute for Self-Development, established to promote the advancement of youth.

It is my privilege to be able to join with the Southern New Jersey Chapter of the National Conference of Christians and Jews as they honor Mrs. Parks on May 4, 1990.

SENATE—Friday, May 4, 1990

(Legislative day of Wednesday, April 18, 1990)

The Senate met at 9:30 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the Honorable DAVID PRYOR, a Senator from the State of Arkansas.

PRAYER

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Today's prayer will be offered by a guest Chaplain, the Reverend David Doyle, of the United Baptist Church of Concord, NH.

The Reverend David Doyle offered the following prayer:

Let us pray:

Heavenly Father, it is with confidence that we approach You today on behalf of those who have been endued with the power of government. We ask that they might be given wisdom, for the task is delicate; that they might be given courage to withstand the pressure of political expediency; and that they might be given stamina for the task is unending.

Thank You for the tasks that stretch us, that cause us to use all of our faculties, and that show us that we are more than we imagined. Such is the task that confronts our Senators.

But as well, Lord, lest they become inflated with the responsibilities, lest they become too concerned with pleasing others, let them remember the needs of our whole country, let the call of statesmanship be upon them, and let the rewards of a job well done be theirs.

We ask for Your favor to be bestowed upon them as they exercise Your authority on Earth. Amen.

APPOINTMENT OF ACTING PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will please read a communication to the Senate from the President pro tempore [Mr. BYRD].

The legislative clerk read the following letter:

U.S. SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, DC, May 4, 1990.

To the Senate:

Under the provisions of rule I, section 3, of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby appoint the Honorable DAVID PRYOR, a Senator from the State of Arkansas, to perform the duties of the Chair.

ROBERT C. BYRD,
President pro tempore.

Mr. PRYOR thereupon assumed the chair as Acting President pro tempore.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the standing order, the majority leader is recognized.

THE JOURNAL

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Journal of the proceedings be approved to date.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SCHEDULE

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, this morning following the time for the two leaders, there will be a period for morning business not to extend beyond 10 a.m., with Senators permitted to speak therein for up to 5 minutes each.

At 10 this morning, the Senate resumes consideration of S. 135, the Hatch Act reform bill. Under the unanimous-consent agreement granted last night, Senator ROTH will be recognized to offer an amendment regarding caucuses.

Once the debate is completed on that amendment, it will be laid aside in order for Senator ROTH to offer a second amendment regarding personal causes of action. The second Roth amendment also will be debated today. There will be no rollcall votes today. Any votes required relative to the two Roth amendments offered today will occur next Tuesday morning.

The unanimous-consent agreement also provides that on Monday, when debate on the Hatch Act reform bill is resumed, the following Senators will be recognized to offer first-degree amendments: Senator DOLE to offer two amendments; then Senator ROTH and Senator SIMPSON to offer amendments. The amendments offered during Monday's session will be fully debated and any votes required relative to those amendments will also be put off until Tuesday morning.

Therefore, Mr. President, to summarize the schedule for today and Monday and Tuesday morning, there will be no rollcall votes today or Monday. Six amendments to the bill will be offered on today and Monday, and debate completed upon those before the close of business on Monday.

Any rollcall votes relative to those six amendments will occur on Tuesday morning, beginning around 10 o'clock in the morning. Senators should be on notice that while there are no rollcall votes today or Monday, there will be several rollcall votes on Tuesday beginning around 10 a.m.

Mr. President, it is my hope and intention that we will complete action on this bill next week, I hope in the early part of the week. Therefore, Senators should be on notice that the Senate will remain in session next week until we finish this bill, one way or the other, and it is possible that we could have lengthy evening sessions as we attempt to complete action on this bill.

RESERVATION OF LEADER TIME

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my leader time, and I reserve all of the leader time of the distinguished Republican leader.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. MITCHELL. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of morning business, not to extend beyond the hour of 10 a.m., with Senators permitted to speak therein for not to exceed 5 minutes each.

Mr. McCAIN addressed the Chair.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arizona.

MANPOWER TRANSITION PLAN

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, I rise today to address the need for a comprehensive transition plan to protect the men and women in our Armed Forces.

We now face the most urgent crisis in the way we treat our military personnel since the days in which we carried out massive personnel cuts following World War II. During the next few years, we may have to force nearly half a million volunteers to leave military service, the vast majority against their will. Not since Lewis Johnson faced drastic cuts in the numbers of men and women in the military in 1948 and threatened to completely dismantle the structure of the military, have we faced the reductions that we face today.

The rumors of these cuts are already having a major impact on morale. Military men and women are bewildered and confused about their future careers. They know that the coming cuts in the all volunteer military are going to be extremely large, but they have no idea of how their lives and those of their families will be affected.

These men and women are volunteers. They joined to serve their country. Most joined to make the military a career. We must act to protect them. We need to show them that we care. We need to show them that their service and sacrifices are appreciated by a grateful country.

This is why I believe we must now address the need to protect the men and women of our volunteer military force. Our current system clearly does not provide the needed protection. It assumes that virtually all military personnel will either leave military service at time of their own choosing, or retire with substantial benefits after making the military their career. It is not set up to deal with the reality that tens of thousands of fully qualified personnel will be forced to leave military service years before they planned to do so, and often with only limited warning.

We need legislation that will take account of this new reality. We need a transition plan that will provide improved separation pay, unemployment compensation, relocation, and outplacement services, priorities in Federal hiring, benefits under the GI bill, and medical insurance. We need to take urgent action to protect our men and women in the military services as we reduce our forces and defense budgets.

THE NEED FOR URGENT ACTION

The problems we face in protecting our service personnel could rise to crisis state at any moment. The Congress and the administration have already failed to come to a timely agreement to reprogram funding for military manpower. I sincerely hope that the current debate over the supplemental to this year's budget will resolve this issue without having to cut 56,000 to 68,000 more men and women from the military services, and massive involuntary cuts in military strength. But we cannot rely on mere hope to solve this dilemma.

Even if we get all the reprogramming we need for this year, we will still have to cut 75,000 to 125,000 men and women from the armed services next year, and possibly even more depending on the level of cuts in that defense budget. Over the next several years we can expect to see cuts of 500,000 to 700,000 people from the armed services.

I think we all recognize that these manpower cuts are necessary, and that additional manpower cuts may be necessary in future years. As I have previously stated before this body, we must reduce our force levels and defense spending as fundamental changes in the threat and the roles and missions of our forces change. But while we face the realities of our changing world, we must also be aware that dedicated and highly competent personnel who are fully qualified to stay in the military, and who, at any other time would be promoted to higher ranks, will be cut from the military. We must make these manpower cuts with conscience and compassion. We must make a comprehensive effort to protect the men and women who will be forced to prematurely end their careers.

OUR RESPONSIBILITY TO THE MEN AND WOMEN IN OUR ALL VOLUNTEER FORCE STRUCTURE

I cannot praise these men and women enough. For the last 17 years, the United States has successfully executed its global mission without a peacetime draft. It has done so only because we have asked a small fraction of our citizens to assume the risks and responsibilities of national defense, and we have built an all-volunteer force of men and women who planned to make the military their profession.

It is thanks in large part to their dedication and sacrifice that we are now on the threshold of realizing the benefits of our defense of democratic ideals over the last 40 years. It is thanks to them, we see free governments being formed in Eastern Europe, and the threat of a major war in Europe decreased to minimal levels. It is thanks to them, that we can now prudently reduce our own forces.

I wish we could make such reductions without forcing men and women out of military service. In fact, the Department of Defense has already indicated that it will make every effort to avoid cutting personnel who want to continue to serve their country. Each military service is planning to accommodate as many reductions as possible through voluntary discharges, retirements, and end of obligated service discharges.

It is clear, however, that such measures will not be enough. The Army is already faced with an immediate need to cut manpower, a need that has been made more difficult because of the failure to authorize reprogramming into the manpower accounts of this year's defense budget. It is forced to cut its end strength by at least 40,000 this year. It will be forced to cut at least 75,000 more personnel next year, and the total could be as high as 125,000.

It is clear the U.S. Army will have to force large numbers of career soldiers out of the military. In fact, "riffed"—the military term for forcing men and women to leave military service in order to reduce force size—is already becoming a common term on U.S. Army posts throughout the world.

These forced cuts in personnel are provoking growing concern among both officers and enlisted ranks, and with good reason. The post Vietnam cuts led to the confused and improper handling of thousands of personnel who had served their country in an unpopular war. Army personnel and their families have no clear guarantee that this neglect will not be repeated.

It is not just the Army that will be affected. Military personnel in all branches of service will face manpower cuts. Even if we make conservative estimate of the coming cuts in defense spending, over the next 5 years the Navy will drop from 480,000 to 597,000. The Marine Corps will drop from 160,000 to 197,000. The Air Force will drop from 428,000 to 571,000.

Unless we provide these dedicated men and women with a comprehensive protection plan, uniformed personnel who are forced to leave the service will do so with few of the options and protection available to those who retire or voluntarily leave the military. Tens of thousands of fully qualified personnel and their families from every State are going to be affected.

Mr. President, we need to be able to deal with this situation in a way where every man and woman currently serving in the U.S. Armed Forces can be certain that they will be properly protected. Even under the worst conditions, we must do whatever we can to ensure that we will never repeat the mistakes we have made in previous personnel cuts.

Our service men and women need to know that the personnel reductions are well thought out and well programmed. It is important that those that we ask to leave understand why and how this reduction is being done. They need to be assured that they will not be forgotten in the rush to meet budget goals or reduce defense expenditures.

A COMPREHENSIVE TRANSITION PLAN

This is why I will soon submit legislation to create a comprehensive transition plan to protect the personnel that will be forced out of the military services. This legislation sets forth specific proposals to improve separation pay, unemployment compensation, relocation services, outplacement services, benefit briefings and health care considerations, Montgomery GI bill enhancements, and other programs that will assist those who are involuntarily separated.

Let me summarize what my legislation calls for in each of these areas:

SEPARATION PAY

First, in the case of separation pay, it is only available to officers at the present time. We need to ensure that it is available to career enlisted personnel as well as career officers.

My legislation will provide all service members, commissioned officers, warrant officers, and enlisted, who are involuntarily but honorably discharged, separated or denied reenlistment with separation pay.

To be eligible, a service member must have served 7 years of continuous and honorable service. This legislation is consistent with the Department of Defense's guidelines on separation pay as they exist today, meaning that the criteria to receive 100 percent of authorized separation pay will remain the same in my legislation as it is currently constructed by DOD policy today.

This legislation will remove the current $30,000 cap so that members having served longer periods of active duty will be better compensated for lifetime losses in retired pay. The separation pay amounts will be based on the amount of time a member has served and their rank.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the proposed severance pay plan be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, unemployment compensation now available to military personnel is different than that offered to other workers. This is not fair. Unemployment compensation should provide the same 26 weeks of compensation available to civilians, and should be available after 1 week. Currently, former military are eligible for only 13 weeks of compensation and have to wait 4 weeks before they become eligible to receive unemployment compensation.

This legislation will repeal UCX, 5 U.S.C. 8521(c).

RELOCATION SERVICES

Third, relocation services are needed to help former military personnel assimilate into a new community. Those who are involuntarily separated will be authorized permissive temporary duty and leave in order to visit areas where they may wish to relocate.

In addition, the program will provide departing service members with information as available about the area where they are considering relocating.

OUTPLACEMENT SERVICES

Under this legislation, the Department of Defense would provide job search and job referral services to those released from active duty and who are eligible for severance pay. Spouses of those involuntarily separated will also be authorized to participate in the outplacement programs.

This legislation will establish procedures to expedite providing names and addresses of those involuntarily separated, and their spouses, who voluntarily agree to make them available to outside entities. In addition, the bill will encourage the President to establish a committee to seek private sector cooperation and job placement.

The legislation will give priority placement to those involuntarily separated service members for Federal jobs. By using these skilled military personnel, those who have demonstrated their capabilities and loyalty, substantial cost savings will be realized through eliminating unnecessary recruiting and background investigation expense.

MONTGOMERY GI BILL

This legislation will allow those service members who are involuntarily separated to become vested in the Montgomery GI bill educational benefit. The service member will pay the $1,200 required to become vested in the program and will be eligible to receive the full educational benefit.

There are those who did not sign up in the program, counting on making the military a career. With that option no longer available, the need for the Montgomery GI bill benefits becomes necessary.

The opportunity to further one's education, particularly under the circumstances that these military men and women face should be greatly encouraged.

HEALTH CARE

Involuntarily separated military and their families will be eligible to CHAMPUS at active duty rates for 3 months after separation from active duty. Individuals enrolling in the uniform services insurance program within that 3-month period will have continued eligibility for documented preexisting conditions. Involuntarily separated service members and family members who are pregnant at the time separation orders are executed will be covered under CHAMPUS at active duty rates.

Additionally, beneficiaries undergoing care and treatment for an injury, illness, or disease, including pregnancy for beneficiaries in their last trimester, at a military facility as of midnight of the member's date of separation from active duty will be entitled to receive continuing care and treatment as designees of the Secretaries of the military departments. Such care and treatment as secretarial designees will be authorized at a military facility with the capability to provide medically necessary and appropriate continuous care. This care will continue until such time as the injury, illness, or disease, including pregnancy, cannot be materially improved by further hospitalization or treatment, or such time as other insurance becomes effective, or after 1 year, whichever is first.

BRIEFING

Finally, the services will be required to establish these programs and to make them available to the service members. Included in the briefing will be relocation and outplacement services, information on reserve components and National Guard programs, veterans benefits, Montgomery GI bill benefits, priority placement, unemployment compensation, life insurance and health care plans. Family members will be encouraged to attend the briefings as well.

Mr. President, I do not wish to give the impression that I have not had help in this effort. I am working with the Office of the Secretary of Defense, with staff of the Senate Armed Services Committee, and the staff of the Veterans' Affairs Committee. Further, I have drawn on several important pieces of legislation that have been proposed by others. Additionally, I have asked the Military Coalition, a group of 22 military associations, to work with me in developing this package.

The work of Dorsey Chescavage and Sydney Hickey of the National Military Family Association, the efforts of Paul Arcari and Bill Hart of the Retired Officers Association, and Mack McKinney of the Non-Commissioned Officers Association has been particularly useful.

I am still in the process of formulating the exact details of how this plan should be transformed into legislation, and I am glad to listen to additional suggestions and the views of my colleagues.

I want to act today, however, to assure the men and women in the military, that Congress is not ignoring them, and that efforts are already underway to ensure that they will be treated properly if they are forced to prematurely end their chosen career. These men and women met their obligation to us, and I will do everything in my power to ensure that we will meet our obligation to them.

Mr. President, this legislation is necessary and it is necessary now. The incredible ignorance and unrest and concern that exists in the military today about the future of these young men and women cannot be overestimated. They deserve to know what their future holds.

As we find ourselves enmeshed in the macroeconomic issues of today, Mr. President, we cannot neglect those men and women. We must provide them with a clear-cut path that they can pursue as they make this very painful transition, many of them, from military service to civilian life.

I appreciate the indulgence of the Chair in allowing me to address this very complicated, but I think very important issue. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I appreciate Senator McCAIN's effort to come to grips with the uncertainties our military personnel and their families face as our forces build down over the next few years.

I too am concerned that we provide fair and equitable treatment to our men and women in uniform and their families who may be affected by reductions in force—particularly those who have committed to a career in the military and now will not be permitted to have it. I think that the transition services that Senator McCAIN proposes have merit and I certainly expect that we will review them carefully when the Subcommittee on Manpower and Personnel of the Committee on Armed Services meets to mark up the fiscal year 1991 Defense authorization request.

With regard to providing separation pay to personnel who are involuntarily separated, I believe that there may be compensation alternatives that treat our military personnel more fairly. For example, I am exploring the feasibility of vesting military personnel in the retirement system at an earlier date. I do not know whether we can do that or not, but it is certainly worth a try.

Civilian personnel in the Government and in the private sector are vested under various schedules as early as 5 years of employment under the Employee Retirement Income Security Act [ERISA]. I expect to have a military vesting option that builds on the ERISA concept for consideration by the time the subcommittee marks up.

I want to also note that Senator COHEN introduced a bill, S. 2352, on March 28 that would extend involuntary separation pay eligibility to enlisted personnel. This pay is currently entitled to certain officers who are involuntarily separated. So I expect we will consider this proposal, as well as Senator McCAIN's proposal, in our markup.

I share Senator McCAIN's concern that there is a great deal of uncertainty among our military personnel about how big the military strength cuts are going to be in the future and what kind of compensation we will provide to those who are given a pink slip. Right now, I do not have any figures I can lay out. I have asked for figures from the Department of Defense which I have yet to receive. That tells me that the Department of Defense is not sure of what the numbers are at this point. I do know that the way the defense budget is shaping up for fiscal year 1991 that relatively large cuts in near-term strength levels are practically inevitable.

Whatever the reduction though, I am committed to ensuring that our men and women in uniform and their families are fairly treated. I am not sure that any or all of the proposals that have been put forth thus far truly provide equitable compensation on a systematic basis to those who will be adversely affected by the force build down. Of course, these proposals are well intentioned and I believe we should carefully consider all of them. At the same time, I believe we need to make sure we have explored all options, such as vesting to make sure we have a coherent, comprehensive package that in the end is fair to our military personnel and their families.

As chairman of the Subcommittee on Manpower and Personnel of the Committee on Armed Services, I pledge to work to accomplish this end. I look forward to working with Senator McCAIN.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

TAX FREEDOM DAY

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, May 5 marks Tax Freedom Day for 1990, according to the Tax Foundation. This is the day that the American taxpayer stops paying the Government and starts working for him or herself.

Up to this point in the year, the average taxpayer has worked to earn enough to cover Federal, State, and local taxes. Tomorrow, May 5, the taxpayer can finally begin to enjoy his or her own earnings.

Unfortunately, May 5 is the latest Tax Freedom Day ever. This reflects the 34 percent of income the average American will fork over in taxes during 1990. Tax relief is clearly needed, and could be provided with projected defense savings. But Congress is poised to fritter away the peace dividend on a huge spending spree, pushing tax freedom back further and further in the 1990's.

Instead, we should return the peace dividend to the people by reducing their tax burden. This is why I have introduced S. 2530, the Roth defense rebate.

Over 5 years, my bill would cut the 15-percent bottom tax rate by 20 percent.

It would also trim the 28-percent rate in the next bracket applied to middle-income Americans by 10.7 percent.

Once phased in, my defense rebate would produce annual savings of $600 for a married couple with $20,000 of taxable income, and $1,500 for a married couple with $50,000 of taxable income. By shifting resources back to the private sector, they will be used by savers, investors, and consumers in ways which provide more benefits than costs.

Our economy and taxpayers are already groaning under the weight of financing $1.2 trillion in Federal spending. This spending level is expected to rise to $1.5 trillion by the mid-1990's. Surely, this is a sufficient amount of resources to address our Nation's needs.

By now, it should be clear that none of the peace dividend will actually be used for deficit reduction. It will be spent several times over by the time we are through. By promoting reckless spending, congressional retention of the peace dividend will enlarge the deficit.

Returning the peace dividend to the taxpayer is the only way to stop the perpetual congressional spending machine and help make Tax Freedom Day come earlier for the taxpayer in the 1990's.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE BUDGET

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, I call to the attention of my colleagues, this morning's Washington Post article entitled "Bush Limits Budget Talks to 'Process'." Mr. President, the substance of the article will be realized right in the last paragraph.

> At his news conference yesterday, Bush said, "We sent a budget up, and, okay, so nobody was too enthusiastic about it. . . . Nobody's so very enthusiastic about the Senate budget. Nobody's very enthusiastic about the House budget, in my view—really enthusiastic." As a result, Bush added, "it seemed like a good time to sit down and . . . see where we go now."

I would only counsel, Mr. President, that we see where we are now. Rather than just limiting the budget talks to process, we should limit it to the truth. If we can determine the problem, then we can determine the solution.

Specifically, as Mark Twain said years ago, "The truth is such a precious thing, it should be used very sparingly." And therein is the answer, why no one is enthusiastic. Certainly no one was enthusiastic about the Bush budget if we adopt it into law, ipso facto, in the next 2 minutes, it would not solve the problem but only compound the problem.

Similarly, for the House budget and the Senate budget, because we start at a starting line designated by Mr. Richard Darman of OMB of some $50.9 billion off the real running deficit for 1991. We know the revenues since that time, in January, when he made the projection are running about $20 billion behind. We looked at the March picture.

We know that there is another $20 billion in FSLIC, or Resolution Trust Company Fund. And we know that there is a majority vote in both Houses for Social Security to be taken off budget and if thievery stopped, namely expenditure of those funds stopped, if you add those all together, sitting down around the table, as grown individuals would do and talking sense to each other, you would come to $135.4 billion lost there. If you give the President equal credit, if we think a majority will vote for Social Security thievery to stop, and, of course, a majority for capital gains tax—I happen to not be in that majority. But it was only prevented from passage by a parliamentary maneuver last year, and I do not think it will go through again.

So Social Security will come up; capital gains will come up. So from that 135 loss there, we would say let us gain for the first year 5 and the outyears you are going to be losing, but give the President credit for his analysis, it is $130.4 billion. Then to come down to what they have said, to $36 billion or $37 billion, to get to that $64 billion target, the task is really 166 to 167.4 rather than 37.

No one in his right mind is going to say let us get together and cut $166 billion out of the budget or, on the other hand, try to raise $166 billion in revenues. But if we can designate and understand, appreciate and agree upon the problem itself, then if we come up with $37 billion the first year and program out a solution over the next 2, 3, 4 years, whatever is realistic, the markets will respond, the deficit will come down, interest rates will come down, and then we will be able to join in the rejuvenation of capitalism the world around, specifically in the United States. We see it in East Europe; we see it down in Central America and everywhere else, but we are finding the failures of capitalism. In the market there, unemployment is on the way up. Real estate is absolutely gone. You cannot get a credit from a bank in this very minute.

We are just grinding to a halt. We are losing thousands of jobs. On the early morning news, it was said we are losing 20,000 to 30,000 jobs a month over this country.

It is all because of us right here in the summit about to take place on Sunday. We used to have a little radio program my children used to listen to on Saturday morning about Big John and Sparkie all the way through life, keep your eye on the donut and not the hole. The hole is process.

It is very convenient to say this has gotten into a terrible process, and Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, and it is terrible. As one of the authors, no one thought that was a well-designed thing, but it sure held the line for a couple of years and would hold the line now if they would tell the truth. They have been able to really get into further trouble by diversions, smoking mirrors, extravagant kinds of economic projections, and everything else of that kind.

So I think the leadership ought to agree on getting together and actually assign and agree upon the problem itself. If we can tell that truth and tell the American people the truth, the monkeyshines would stop and we would begin to look like a Congress of the people up here in Washington. No Governor, no mayor, has been allowed the luxury of the nonsense we have been engaged in for the past 3 or 4 years.

Gramm-Rudman-Hollings did work in 1985, 1986. Since 1987, when we got together at Christmastime in the White House and a deal was a deal, that was a cover, that was a charade. Neither side was going to tell on each other and we were going to get by the 1988 election. Now the game plan is to slide by to get by the 1990 election and then get by the 1992 election, and we get deeper in debt. The economy worsens every minute.

So I will just counsel very strongly, Mr. President, that it is not the process; that the leaders get together and designate the problem and then we can go on a realistic fashion. Then we do not have to worry about Gramm-Rudman-Hollings or any laws, just the laws Stephenson counseled years back of common sense. He said now is the time to talk common sense to the American people. I think if we can do that, then we will be appreciated up here as really representing the hopes and aspirations of the American people.

I thank the distinguished leaders of the measure at hand.

THREE OUTSTANDING KANSAS WOMEN

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I want to take a moment to recognize three outstanding women from Wichita, KS. They are being honored by that city tomorrow evening at an extraordinary event given by the Wichita Art Association. I deeply regret not being able to be there. But as a Kansan and an American, I am deeply grateful for their immeasurable contributions.

Mary Clementine Koch, Gladys Wiedemann, and Olive Ann Beech have dedicated their lives to the improvement of the community, the State of Kansas, and the Nation. Each has lived by the credo that America will thrive only, if we give back more than we have received.

So, today, here on the floor of the Senate, I join the Wichita Art Association in commending these women for a lifetime of charitable deeds. They have demonstrated dedication, courage, and vision in their drive to improve the quality of life in their city and State communities.

These gracious ladies have used their positions as community business leaders to champion hundreds of civic projects. They are active members of the Wichita Art Association, the Wichita Symphony and the theater. By funding scholarships and memberships to the Art Association, each has enabled many to enjoy the richness that art brings to our lives. Their charitable contributions have enhanced hospitals, universities, the YWCA, the Boy Scouts, the Girl Scouts, and the 4-H Club. The list, Mr. President, would fill pages of this RECORD.

Most important, these women have had the insight to realize that the strength of American cultural life is integral to the well-being of society as a whole. Their determination to share the wealth they earned is a reflection of the best of Kansan and American values.

But by sharing the things of truly lasting value, these women have earned in the process something beyond price: The deep gratitude and admiration of their community. Today this Kansan proudly salutes them.

Thank you, Mr. President.

TERRY ANDERSON

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise to inform my colleagues that today marks the 1,875th day that Terry Anderson has been held in captivity in Beirut.

TRIBUTE TO ADELA LAGODZINSKA

Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. President, I was saddened to learn of the death of Ms. Adela Lagodzinska, honorary president of the Polish Woman's Alliance of America. For more than 40 years she served the Polish community in America and fought for the rights of those in Poland. We will all miss her drive and her commitment to the causes of Poland and Polonia. The Glos Polek, the Polish Women's Voice, has published an eloquent tribute to Ms. Lagodzinska, which I would like to have included in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the tribute was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A TRIBUTE: HONORARY PRESIDENT ADELA LAGODZINSKA, 1895-1990

Adela Lagodzinska, Honorary President of the Polish Women's Alliance of America died on March 20, 1990, at the age of 94.

She had spent the last years of her life in a nursing home in a suburb of Chicago, the anonymity and quietness of her sunset years belying the active and prominent life that preceded them.

She had been Vice President of the PWA for eight years and National President for twenty-four. For over thirty years Adela Lagodzinska was a national officer of one of the largest Polish American fraternal benefit societies in the U.S.

Under the able leadership the PWA rose to the challenge of bringing aid, both material and moral, to a Polish nation torn by war, oppressed by Communist rule and at times forgotten by the rest of the world.

Adela Lagodzinska was also a well known and much respected leader in Polonia, working with the Polish American Congress since its inception in 1944, with the State Department, the US Congress and the Polish Relief Fund, doing all that was possible to help bring Poland back into the family of free and financially independent nations.

She was born in Chicago on December 12, 1895, the daughter of active members of local Polonia. She joined the PWA, Group 239 at age of 24 and at the National Convention, which was held in 1939 in Niagara Falls, was asked to serve as the Secretary of The Convention. At this Convention she was elected to the office of Vice President.

As Vice President she was the Chairperson of the Komitet Oswiaty. At the time, the agenda of this committee was a very busy and varied one. The committee worked out programs which were held for the different celebrations during the year, organized cultural events, supported Polish arts and letters, especially the work of Polish women, and published several books.

Vice President Lagodzinska issued a sharp protest when the Encyclopedia Britannica published its World Atlas in 1943, in which Poland had been eliminated from the map of Europe.

To honor the 80th birthday of Ignacy J. Paderewski and to pay tribute to all that he had accomplished during his busy life, A. Lagodzinska as the head of Komitet Oswiaty, organized a concert on May 2, 1941 in the Chicago Civic Opera House, featuring the famous tenor, Jan Kiepura. The concert, which was meant to raise funds for the Ignacy Paderewski Relief Fund, was widely acclaimed by both the American and Polish press and raised $3,000 for the Relief Fund.

At the 20th National Convention held in Chicago in 1947, A. Lagodzinska was elected President of the PWA. During her first term the PWA celebrated its 50th anniversary which was honored with a very rich and varied program.

When news of Cardinal Wyszynski's arrest reached the U.S. President Lagodzinska sent letters of protest to representatives of the United Nations, to Congressmen, Senators, and to the Secretary of State, F. Dulles. She also testified before The Congressional Committee investigating the Katyn Forest Massacre in 1951.

When the Archdiocese of Philadelphia gave permission in 1955 to Father Michal Zembrzuski for the founding of a new Pauline monastery, the National Board and PWA members, especially from the Eastern states, hurried with their help. Every year on the feast day of Our Lady of Czestochowa, the patron saint of the PWA, a pilgrimage is held for PWA members. On the occasion of the 65th anniversary of our organization, Father Zembrzuski dedicated a Tree of Love on the grounds of the Shrine as a token of gratitude to the PWA. Adela Lagofzinska had been very dedicated to this project and a special relationship exists through the present between the PWA and the Shrine.

On August 15, 1956, A. Lagodzinska took her trip to Poland. On the feast day of Our Lady of Czestochowa she took part in the celebration commemorating the 300th anniversary of King Jan Kazimierz's vows to Our Lady, making her the Queen of Poland. It was a very difficult time in Poland charged with tension after the arrest of Cardinal Wyszynski. In Poznan, Poles were protesting and demanding bread and freedom.

The peoples' response to the persecution of the government was to asemble, two million strong, at Czestochowa to pay tribute to the Queen of Poland and to ask for her protection. President Lagodzinska, in relating her impression from the pilgrimage, said that she would never forget the emotions she felt when two million people, in total concentration and religious dedication, repeated in unison the vows of King Jan Kazimierz, placing themselves, their families and their nation in the care of the Queen of Poland. This was the first, unforgettable meeting of the President with the land of her fathers.

Still under the impression of this first visit, the President organized a pilgrimage of the PWA to Poland. This was the second such pilgrimage in the history of the PWA, the first having taken place in 1928 under the direction of President Emilia Napieralska. Cardinal Wyszynski who was free by the time the pilgrimage took place, spoke to the PWA members at Jasna Gora.

In 1958, during graduation ceremonies at Orchard Lake, Bishop S. Woznicki awarded President Lagodzinska the Fidelitas Medal in recognition of her service for the good of the Church, the United States and Poland. She was the first woman to receive the medal.

In 1959, representatives of the Polish American Congress presented the Secretary of State with two resolutions, dealing with Poland's western borders on the Oder-Niesse line and with proposed loans to Poland. President A. Lagodzinska had participated in the preparation of these resolutions and during the meetings took active part in the discussions, arguing the case for the loans to Poland and supporting her arguments with personal observations made during her trips to Poland.

After acquainting herself with the situation in Europe, A. Lagodzinska initiated aid for displaced persons. She also organized aid for the Catholic University of Lublin, funding the equipment for the Biology Lab and shelves for one of the rooms of the school's library.

During the commemoration of the 50th anniversary of Maria Konopnicka's death in Zarowiec, Poland, she purchased the furniture for four of the classrooms in the Maria Konopnicka School in the town. Thanks to her as well, the PWA bought the furniture for another school, the General Sikorski School in Jalowka.

She worked with the Rada Polonii (Relief Fund for Poland) as Secretary-General. She traveled to Poland to oversee personally if the aid sent by the organization was indeed reaching the intended recipients and to see firsthand what other needs there were. She contributed to the orphanages in Poland run by orders of Sisters and to the Hospital for the Blind in Laski.

In 1971, at the 26th National Convention in Pittsburgh, she was named Honorary President and lifetime delegate to the National Conventions with an advisory vote. For her contributions to the cause of Polonia and the Polish nation, A. Lagodzinska received the Polonia Restituta medal from the President of the Polish Government in Exhile, August Zaleski. Alliance College in Cambridge, PA awarded her an Honorary Doctorate.

Her contributions to the organization, to Poland and to Polonia were many. The PWA was her life and she gave unstintingly of her time and talent to ensure the organization's growth and dedication to the right causes, both in the US and abroad.

She was a third generation Polish American who taught herself to speak and read Polish and who came to love the country of her fathers and its people. She should be remembered and honored for a lifetime of giving of herself to the PWA and for all that was Polish.

Her favorite cause was Dziecko Polskie and a Memorial was made in her name for this fund. Contributions were made by the National Officers and State Presidents.

Let us keep her memory alive by remembering and supporting her vision of a free Poland and of a PWA that is strong and giving of its time and resources to those who need it.

NEWMAN'S OWN COMMITTED TO IMPROVING SOCIETY

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, when actor Paul Newman joined with his friend, author A.E. Hotchner, in 1982 to create Newman's Own Foods in 1982, they founded a company that not only produced excellent food, but also truly gave something back to the community.

Newman's Own takes pride in the fact that all profits from the sales of its products—salad dressing, spaghetti sauce, lemonade and popcorn—are donated to charity. In just 7 years the company has given away more than $26 million to worthwhile organizations in the United States and throughout the world where its products are sold. Its impact has been felt as far away as Europe, and as close as the community in which it was founded, Westport, CT.

In 1989 Newman's Own gave away $7 million to 320 charities, emphasizing those groups which work with AIDS, benefit the homeless, the elderly, the abused, the sick, and the young.

Newman's Own has been cited by the Council on Economic Priorities as a socially responsible company and has received numerous humanitarian awards for Newman's Own voluntary efforts for its services. Recently, Connecticut Gov. William O'Neill presented Newman's Own with the Governor's Laurel Award for its work on behalf of nonprofit organizations.

In times of national disaster, Newman's Own has responded quickly with much needed contributions. Last October, days after Hurricane Hugo had ripped through the Southeast, Newman's Own sent a $100,000 check to the Red Cross Hurricane Hugo Fund. And when the San Francisco earthquake devastated and displaced millions of bay area residents, the company provided 10,000 pounds of spaghetti sauce to the temporarily homeless in Watsonville, CA, and presented a $250,000 check to the Red Cross Earthquake Disaster Relief Fund.

The largest project Newman's Own has undertaken, the one nearest to my heart, is the Hole in the Wall Gang Camp. The camp, which opened 2 years ago, takes children ages 7 to 15 with cancer and other serious blood-related illnesses. Since 1986, when Paul Newman conceived of the idea of founding a camp, Newman's Own has donated over $8.5 million.

The camp's magnificant setting in the northeastern Connecticut towns of Ashford and Eastford provides children with an opportunity to spend time away from home and hospitals. Built to resemble a small western mining town like the one in Newman's "Butch Cassidy and the Sundance Kid," the camp is free of charge to children and their families.

Serving on the board of the Hole in the Wall Gang Camp has been an education for me. I have seen the fortitude and courage of children attending the camp, their drive to leave their illnesses behind them. Through Newman's Own, Paul Newman has made a substantial difference in the lives of hundreds of children.

Mr. President, through the hard work of a small staff dedicated to producing high-quality products and to giving its profits to charity, Newman's Own has made a major contribution to the local community and to the Nation. I am glad to participate in Paul Newman's endeavors, and glad to honor Newman's Own for its commitment to improving society.

NO ENCOURAGEMENT ON THE PEACE PROCESS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, despite earlier hope that the recent meeting between Egypt's President Mubarak and Syria's President Assad might help move forward the peace process—it now appears that no real progress was achieved.

Press reports indicate that—despite Mubarak's urging—Assad gave no sign that he intends any time soon to join the peace process, and agree to direct talks with Israel.

During my recent visit to Syria, I and the other Senators on my delegation pressed Assad hard to respond to the new realities in the Middle East—particularly the drawdown in Soviet support for Syria—by agreeing to join Mubarak and representatives of the Palestinian people in a dialog with Israel.

I can't say that Assad indicated any willingness to do so. He basically stuck to his standard line—that there must be an international conference, and that the PLO was the sole representative of the Palestinians.

Nonetheless, the fact that Assad has finally given up its efforts to isolate Egypt, and agreed to this summit with Mubarak without any concessions from Mubarak offered some hope for a softening of Assad's line.

There has been some small progress in Damascus on at least one front—the release of two of our hostages. I have joined others in expressing appreciation to the Syrian Government for its role in those releases.

But I am disappointed that, for now at least, Syria has not budged from its refusal to join the peace process on any realistic basis.

The other players—Egypt, Israel and representatives of the Palestinians—at least are communicating about the prospects for talking. Syria hasn't even gotten that far.

I regret that, and want to repeat publicly what our delegation privately told Assad: There is now a window of opportunity to really get the peace process started. Every important player in the region has a responsibility to do everything possible not to let this chance be lost.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Morning business is closed.

HATCH ACT REFORM AMENDMENTS OF 1989

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senate will now proceed to the consideration of S. 135, which the clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 135) to amend title 5, United States Code, to restore to Federal civilian employees their right to participate voluntarily as private citizens, in the political processes of the Nation, to protect such employees from improper political solicitations, and for other purposes.

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Delaware is recognized to offer an amendment.

AMENDMENT NO. 1583

(Purpose: To provide that the provisions of subchapter III of chapter 73 of title 5, United States Code, shall not apply to certain Federal employees, for an educational plan on political activities, for the clarification of regulations concerning such activities, and for other purposes)

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. ROTH] proposes an amendment numbered 1583.

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SECTION 1. EXCLUSION OF CERTAIN EMPLOYEES.

(a) Chapter 73 of title 5, United States Code, is amended by inserting after section 7328 the following new section:

"§ 7329. Exclusion of certain employees

"The proceding provisions of this subchapter shall not apply to any employee who—

"(1) during a leave of absence, serves as the president of a national labor organization under the provisions of chapter 71 of title 5, United States Code (including the president of any national labor organization representing the United States Postal Service); or

"(2) votes for a candidate for national Federal office at a State political caucus.".

(b) The table of sections for chapter 73 of title 5, United States Code, is amended by inserting after the item relating to section 7328 the following:

"7329. Exclusion of certain employees.".

SEC. 2. REGULATIONS RELATING TO POLITICAL ACTIVITIES OF FEDERAL EMPLOYEES.

The Office of Personnel Management shall prescribe regulations to clarify and simplify the political activity prohibitions applicable to employees of the Federal Government or the government of the District of Columbia. Such regulations shall supersede determinations regarding political activity made by the Civil Service Commission prior to July 19, 1940, under the rules prescribed by the President, and any subsequent decisions based on such determinations.

SEC. 3. EDUCATION PLAN FOR FEDERAL EMPLOYEE POLITICAL RIGHTS.

Each agency employing any employee to whom the provisions of subchapter III of chapter 73 of title 5, United States Code, apply shall (in consulation with the Office of Personnel Management, the Office of the Special Counsel established under section 1211 of title 5, United States Code, and any labor organization representing such employees) develop a plan to educate such employees regarding the provisions of the Hatch Act and Federal employees' rights of political activity under the provisions of chapter 73 of title 5, United States Code. Such plan shall be—

(1) filed no later than two months after the date of the enactment of this Act with the Office of Personnel Management;

(2) implemented as to new employees immediately after filing; and

(3) implemented as to existing employees four months after such date of enactment.

SEC. 4. EFFECTIVE DATE.

The provisions of this Act shall take effect on January 1, 1991.

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, my amendment will address many of the major concerns set forth by proponents as justifying the need for S. 135. I have heard a number of times that individuals were prevented from casting their votes in Presidental caucuses. This amendment addresses that problem.

I have heard a number of times that the Hatch Act is confusing and the regulations governing it are too complicated. Again, this amendment addresses that.

I have heard that the impetus for this legislation is that, according to the committee report, several events combined to make amendment of the Hatch Act a major civil service issue in the 100th Congress. The committee report cites the prosecution of three Federal and postal employee union presidents for alleged violations of the Hatch Act. This amendment addresses that.

This amendment also requires that the agencies of the Federal Government provide an improved educational program for Federal employees to ensure that all employees are familiar with the law. I might parenthetically add, Mr. President, that I believe most employees are familiar with the law and that they obey it and a very significant percentage of Federal employees want to retain it.

Let me briefly explain what this substitute amendment will do. First, it would ensure that under current law Federal employees are provided their right to cast their vote in caucuses for electing nominees for national office in States that use the caucus system instead of a primary.

Proponents have made much of the fact that several employees did not participate in their State's Presidential caucus for fear of violating the Hatch Act. This amendment would address the concern by ensuring this fundamental right to vote. I believe that all who voted for the Hatch Act originally, and those who support the current law, also support the fundamental right of Federal employees to cast their vote.

Second, this amendment provides that the Hatch Act will not apply to a president of a national labor organization as defined under the provisions of title V of the United States Code which governs the civil service. This provision also includes any president of a national labor organization representing the U.S. Postal Service.

Third, the amendment provides that the Office of Personnel Management be directed to issue new regulations that would clarify and simplify the guidance that has been given to Federal employees with respect to the Hatch Act.

This proposal would satisfy the best arguments of proponents for change without risking the benefits of the Hatch Act for American people.

Fourth, Mr. President, this amendment requires the agencies of the executive branch to implement a program to better educate the Federal work force on the do's and the don'ts of the Hatch Act.

Mr. President, this amendment will allow for the continued protection of the Federal employee work force. I believe the amendment addresses directly a concern stated by proponents of the legislation in the committee report. We do not have to repeal the Hatch Act to meet these concerns. Again, Mr. President, I say repeal.

The current law states that an employee may not take an active part in political management or in political campaigns. Let me emphasize again, because this has come up several times, that the current law states that the employees may not, may not take an active part in political management or in political campaigns.

In sharp contrast, S. 135 states that employees may—it does not say "may not"—it says "may" take an active part in political management or in political campaigns. In fact, not only does it change the language from "may not" to "may," but in the opening language it even encourages partisan political activity.

Now, the committee report says section 9(a) is widely regarded as the heart of the Hatch Act.

Mr. President, S. 135, as I have just read, repeals part of section 9(a) of the original law. So here we are. We have the committee saying that section 9(a) is widely regarded as the heart of the Hatch Act, and then we have part of the section being changed from "may not" participate to "may" participate in political activity.

I must respectfully disagree with the chairman of the Governmental Affairs Committee. If that is not repeal, I do not know what is. Instead, what we have here as a substitute is a carefully crafted amendment which meets those specific needs that should be the subject of our concerns.

I stated yesterday the reasons why we should simplify and outline and clarify the regulations. I would like to briefly outline these again. This simplification is timely because these regulations should be clarified to reflect the appellate court decisions in the Biller, Blaylock, and Sombrotto cases.

In addition, Mr. President, I believe this amendment addresses directly the concerns stated by the proponents of the legislation in the committee report and on the floor that the regulations are confusing and should be clarified.

So, Mr. President, what I am seeking to do by this amendment is not, as I have said many times, to throw the baby out with the bath water but retain the basic thrust of the Hatch Act but take care of the legitimate concerns that have arisen.

What we seek to do, as I have already spelled out—and some of these we have offered separately, but we are trying to offer it this morning in one package—is clarify the rules and regulations; second, to ensure that union presidents are in no way harassed in their duties while they are on leaves of absence. And then we are proposing here for the first time that we also take care of the problem of permitting Federal employees to vote in caucuses.

So it seems to me that this is a far better solution to the problem. Let me point out, Mr. President, there is no large demand on the part of the Federal employees that we repeal the Hatch Act, that we no longer protect them from coercion on the job, even though it may take place off the job.

As I said yesterday, I received a letter from FRANK WOLF, who is a Member of Congress representing northern Virginia, where literally tens of thousands of Federal employees live. He says in this letter:

You may be surprised to learn that the majority of Federal employees do not favor changes in the Hatch Act. I surveyed 23,000 of my constituents in 1983, and found that 66 percent favored the existing Hatch Act.

A poll of 10,000 Federal employees published last May by the Federal Employees News Digest found that 70 percent were either neutral or favor current Hatch Act limitations on partisan political activity.

Mr. President, the Federal Executive Institute Alumni Association surveyed their members on a series of issues, including Hatch Act reform. Out of more than 1,300 responses to their questionnaire, over 60 percent indicated their desire that the association not, I emphasize not, support actively Hatch Act reforms.

Then we have the readers of the Federal Employees News Digest. This journal covers Federal employees actively and is read by the Federal employees throughout the country. As part of their 1989 survey, they asked, "How do you feel about the current Hatch Act limitations on partisan political involvement?" Strongly favor, 13 percent; favor, 20 percent; neutral, 36 percent; opposed, 19 percent; strongly opposed, 11 percent.

So you again have roughly 70 percent neutral or opposed to change in the Hatch Act, which for 50 years has protected both the rights of Federal employees and assured the American public—and nobody seems to talk much about the American public—about the need to ensure that the Federal laws are administered in a fair, nonpartisan, and impartial manner.

Then we have a survey from the Government Executive magazine. The question was: "Should the Hatch Act be amended to permit Federal employees to run for office and manage and raise money for campaigns on their own time?"

This is equivalent to the House bill. More than 3,200 Federal employees were interviewed; 60.6 percent said they opposed the reform; only 39.4 agreed with the question.

The Senior Executive Service surveyed their members on a series of issues, including Hatch Act amendments. Their members were asked whether they favor or oppose the House version of the Hatch Act reform. Twenty-one percent of their members responded to the survey. Seventy-four percent oppose reform. That is 74 percent of the senior executives in the Federal Government oppose reform, but only 22 percent favored reform, and 4 percent had no opinion. The majority of 53 percent said the organization should not support the legislation even if it had changes which, of course, the Senate bill does represent certain changes from the House bill.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a poll that was referred to in a letter dated February 19, 1988, from the Senior Executive Association to Senator DAVID PRYOR, who, of course, is the distinguished chairman of the Subcommittee on Federal Services, Post Office, and Civil Service, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENIOR EXECUTIVES ASSOCIATION,
Washington, DC., February 19, 1988.

Senator DAVID H. PRYOR,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Federal Services, Post Office and Civil Service, Committee on Governmental Affairs, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR PRYOR: In late October 1987, the Senior Executives Association mailed to each of our member a letter which briefly described H.R. 3400, the Federal Employees' Political Activities Act, and requested their views with regard to the bill. The Board of Directors felt that member input was critical with regard to the Hatch Act since strong arguments have been put forth both for and against revision. I believe that you will be interested in reviewing the survey results, which I am enclosing along with a copy of the questionnaire.

You will note that, of the 21% of our members who responded, 74% oppose the bill, 22% favor it, and 4% are undecided. To provide a fuller flavor of the views of Senior Executives, I am enclosing for your further information a transcription of the comments which were provided by the respondents.

We understand that you are holding hearings on this matter next week, and we would appreciate your including in the record of the hearing both this letter and the enclosed survey results.

If you or your staff have any questions, or would like additional informaiton, I would be pleased to provide it.

Sincerely,

CAROL A. BONOSARO,
President.

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, I would like to call the attention of my colleagues to the concerns of groups who are vitally interested in this legislation. These groups range over a very broad spectrum, from Common Cause to the Farm Bureau, to the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, to the Federal Bar Association. This is important because who really wants this legislation must be considered. Polls indicate that, if anything, Federal employees on the whole are content with the current law.

The provisions in this legislation would lead directly to the enhancement of certain political action committees, and before we take this monumental step, which I strongly urge against, particularly in view of the fact that next week or in the very near future we are going to be addressing campaign reform—I believe I read in the morning paper that the Democratic Caucus, like the Republican, has come out terminating PAC's for political campaigns.

In any event, certainly the thrust of this campaign reform legislation is that we ought to be doing something about PAC's, not enlarging them, but at least severely restricting them, if not doing away with them in their entirety. Yet, here we are in this legislation that would lead directly to the enhancement of certain political action committees, which I very strongly urge against. But, in any event, we should consider the opinions of groups outside of Government, groups that do not have an immediate vested stake in this legislation.

According to Common Cause, which is a public interest national organization—I am reading from a letter sent to all employees:

This bill seeks to make basic changes in the current Hatch Act restrictions on partisan political activity by Federal workers. In so doing, the legislation opens the door to implicit coercion and abandons the fundamental concept of an unpoliticized civil service. We strongly believe this measure should be rejected. Repeal of the Hatch Act's basic protections, as proposed in S. 135, would increase the potential for widespread abuse and opens the way for implicit coercion against which there is no real protection. But placing restrictions on partisan activity repeal * * *.

I would like to emphasize that, because it underscores what I have been saying, that S. 135 does not represent reform, but it represents repeal, repeal of the Hatch Act. Again, I go back to what Common Cause in its letter to Members of the Senate says:

• • • restrictions on partisan activity repeal, no procedural or other safeguards will be sufficient to protect against subtle forms of political favoritism or coercion of Federal workers. It is important to recognize that under the current Hatch Act, Federal workers are already permitted to engage in various political activities. For example, they may make political contributions to candidates, they may serve as rank and file members of political parties, and they may engage in nonpartisan political activities. It is only the most active level of partisan participation from which they are currently barred. In drawing this line, we believe that the current Hatch Act strikes an appropriate balance between the Federal workers' ability to participate in political activities and the public's rights to fair and impartial administration of government.

In conclusion, Mr. President, the letter states:

Common Cause strongly opposes S. 135 and other proposals that would repeal necessary prohibitions on partisan political activity by Federal employees.

Another group that has raised concerns about this legislation is the Federal Bar Association. In a letter that the association sent to me outlining their opposition to the legislation, the Federal Bar Association wrote:

The practical application of the proposed legislation might make political abuse of Federal employees more likely notwithstanding its continued proscriptions of superiors pressuring subordinates in any fashion. Currently, generally, all active political work is illegal. So there is little temptation by political partisans to recruit Federal employees to engage in such activities simply because such unlawful acts are easily identified. The present legislation will change the focus from proscribing easily identifiable physical acts to proscribing only those physical acts which are improperly motivated through coercion. In this context, we believe it actually is more likely, as a practical matter, that abuse will occur than under the present statute.

Many other groups have written to me to express their opposition to this legislation. The Chamber of Commerce, for example, wrote:

The Hatch Act was passed 50 years ago to protect Federal workers from political pressure by elected and appointed officials. The purpose was to separate the work force from the elected leadership. In much the same way that the civil service has protected Federal employees from the spoils system, the Hatch Act has protected these workers from exploiting their office or being exploited by others.

It has been a benign barrier to politicizing the Federal work force. The Hatch Act has allowed only nonpartisan political involvement by Federal employees.

The Chamber has several concerns about the Hatch Act. These include the use of Government positions to coerce contractors to contribute to candidates, the exertion of pressure on citizens dealing with the Internal Revenue Service, agencies that dispense grants or loans having undue influence over applicants and, particularly, the potential abuse of the Federal worker.

Congress should act to strengthen government by rejecting the Hatch Act amendments. Federal workers need and want a harassment-free workplace. The American taxpayer deserves no less than top performance. The Hatch Act was passed to cure the serious problem of political coercion in the Federal work force. S. 135 would allow that problem to reemerge.

Others include the National Taxpayer Union, who has expressed its strong opposition to this legislation. The National Taxpayer Union points out that public servants who participated in the political process, if allowed by S. 135, would be known as partisan. Once so identified, they would become the target of political parties. Then political rather than public purposes would be served.

In particular, taxpayers fear government contracts being awarded for political rather than cost and quality consideration; promotions being granted for partisan rather than merit criteria; government time being used for political projects, and workers being pressured to support political rather than public ends.

Finally, Mr. President, I want to bring to the attention of my colleagues the views of the International Personnel Management Association. The association is an organization representing over 1,300 member agencies, including Civil Service Commission, Merit System Board and personnel departments at the Federal, State and local level. They write:

The association is concerned that, one, the involvement of career civil service employees in partisan political activities will erode citizen confidence that their laws and regulations are being impartially enforced, and two, public programs and services continue to be delivered on a nonpartisan basis without regard to the recipients' political beliefs or affiliations.

Administration of the public's business is sufficiently fraught with the opportunity for honest disagreement now, without introducing the notion that governmental decisions, whether favorable or unfavorable to the claimant, petitioner or applicant, are colored by political favoritism.

A number of examples of the potential for unnecessary conflict come easily to mind: Taxpayers contesting Internal Revenue Service decisions concerning tax liabilities; foundations seeking tax exempt or other special tax status; claimants contesting Social Security Administration decisions over benefits or disability determination; mine owners contesting decisions by the Mine Safety and Health Administration; farmers and small-business men contesting decisions over eligibility for Federal or State assistance; grant applicants who are denied funding; unsuccessful bidders on public contracts; unsuccessful applicants for Government employment or career advancement in the Civil Service, and unemployment insurance applicants who are denied compensation.

We believe this change in the law would send the wrong message and that, wittingly or unwittingly, there will evolve the perception that hiring, promotions, development assignments and performance bonuses are best earned by demonstrating the "right politics." IPMA's concern is that the proposed amendments to the Hatch Act will foster the appearance, if not actually create the possibility, that decisions made by career civil servants can and are being made for partisan political reasons. Such a perception would have a severely negative impact on the ability of the career civil servants to carry out their responsibilities to any administration and to the American public, whom they serve.

Mr. President, all of these groups have come to realize the merits of the Hatch Act in protecting Federal employees from coercion and providing the American people with a nonpartisan administration of governmental service. This is the essence of the Hatch Act and why it is so important that we retain its provisions. It is so critically important that rather than repealing the Hatch Act, we make the corrections proposed in my amendment and move forward in strengthening the hand of government.

I ask unanimous consent that the material from which I read be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMMON CAUSE,
Washington, DC, September 13, 1989.

DEAR SENATOR ROTH: We are pleased to respond to your request for the views of Common Cause regarding S. 135, the Hatch Act Reform Amendments of 1989. This bill seeks to make basic changes in the current Hatch Act restrictions on partisan political activity by Federal workers. In doing so, the legislation opens the door to implicit coercion and abandons the fundamental concept of an unpoliticized civil service. We strongly believe this measure should be rejected.

The House-passed bill, H.R. 20, would repeal Hatch Act protections and for the first time in almost 50 years allow federal civil service and postal employees to participate in partisan political activity. For example, Federal workers could run as candidates in partisan elections, serve as officers of a political party, raise partisan campaign contributions, manage campaigns, and administer political action committees [PACs]. The only restraint is that the partisan activity would have to occur during off-hours. Common Cause opposed the passage of H.R. 20.

S. 135 also proposes major changes in the Hatch Act, lifting most restrictions on partisan political activity. Like the House bill, a Federal employee would be permitted, among other things, to serve as an officer of a political party or a PAC, become a public campaign official for a candidate, and run as a delegate to a national convention. The Senate bill does prohibit Federal employees from running for partisan political office and from soliciting contributions for partisan candidates. However, it allows government workers to solicit their colleagues for contributions for their own federal employee PACs.

Repeal of the Hatch Act's basic protections, as proposed in S. 135, would increase the potential for widespread abuse and open the way for implicit coercion against which there is no real protection. With basic restrictions on partisan activity repealed, no procedural or other safeguards will be sufficient to protect against subtle forms of political favoritism or coercion of Federal workers.

It is important to recognize that under the current Hatch Act, Federal workers are already permitted to engage in various political activities. For example, they may make political contributions to candidates, serve as rank-and-file members of political parties, and engage in nonpartisan political activities. It is only the most active levels of partisan participation from which they are currently barred. In drawing this line, we believe that the current Hatch Act strikes an appropriate balance between the Federal worker's ability to participate in political activities and the public's right to fair and impartial administration of government.

Common Cause recognizes that the current regulations governing administration of the Hatch Act are complicated. There may be ways to clarify and simplify for workers the degree of participation they are permitted under the Hatch Act without lifting the basic restrictions on partisan activity. We would urge the Senate to instead explore this possibility. As a core principle, however, a careful balance must be struck between an individual's first amendment right of free speech and association and the public's right to impartial administration of government. We believe S. 135 upsets this balance and would open the possibility of a dangerously politicized civil service.

The Hatch Act was designed to ensure that the Federal Government is administered in a fair and impartial manner. We agree with the U.S. Supreme Court which stated, in upholding the constitutionality of the Act, that "it is in the best interest of the country, indeed essential, that Federal service should depend upon meritorious performance rather than political service. . . ."

Common Cause strongly opposes S. 135 and other proposals that would repeal necessary prohibitions on partisan political activity by Federal employees.

Sincerely,

FRED WERTHEIMER,
President.

FEDERAL BAR ASSOCIATION,
Washington, DC, August 17, 1989.

Senator WILLIAM V. ROTH, Jr.,
Senate Governmental Affairs Committee, Dirksen Senate Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR ROTH: The Federal Bar Association, representing attorneys who preside over or practice before Federal Agencies or courts, or are Federal employees themselves, would like to reiterate its views on the Federal Employees Political Activities Act, which the Governmental Affairs Committee reported out on July 26th. As we testified at last year's hearing, we believe that the bill contains three major flaws:

1. The bill does not define "political activity". To the extent that problems exist with the current law, it is due to administrative regulation. Why allow administrative regulation to define this very important point of Hatch Act reform?

2. The practical application of the proposed legislation might make political abuse of Federal employees more likely, notwithstanding its continued proscription of superiors pressuring subordinates in any fashion. Currently, generally all active political work is illegal, so there is little temptation by political partisans to recruit Federal employees to engage in such activity simply because such unlawful acts are easily identified. The present legislation will change the focus from proscribing easily identifiable physical acts to proscribing only those physical acts which are improperly motivated through coercion. In this context, we believe it actually is more likely, as a practical matter, that abuse will occur than under the present statute.

3. The pending legislation contains no provision for excepting therefrom any classes of employees. The nature of the duties and responsibilities of some categories of employees such as law enforcement officials and officers, administrative law judges and other independent adjudicators, requires that such employees be absolutely insulated from any possible risk of improper pressure in order to maintain both fact and appearance of the integrity of the Federal government.

We strongly urge that you not bring the bill to the Senate floor for a vote. However, if the Senate does pass S. 135, we urge you to forcefully insist on your version of Hatch Act reform over the House version. We find the House version too broad and totally unacceptable.

Thank you for your time. If you desire any further information from us, please do not hesitate to call.

Respectfully,

RICHARD J. WIELAND,
President, The Federal Bar Association.

NATIONAL TAXPAYERS UNION,
Washington, DC, July 25, 1989.

DEAR SENATOR: On behalf of the National Taxpayers Union and its 200,000 members, I strongly urge you to vote against S. 135, the "Hatch Act Reform Amendments of 1989." I believe this proposal, if approved, would destabilize existing checks and prohibitions and transform this country's civil service into a politicized mockery of what is now a well-respected, impartial government workforce.

Currently the American public does not harbor a general animosity towards the Federal civil service. NTU believes this is due to current Hatch Act rules which ban partisan political activity by those who have made a choice to pursue a government career. This has been a good system and it has worked to the advantage of the taxpayer by preventing the politicization of government workers.

Despite revisions, NTU believes that S. 135 still would make substantial and unnecessary changes in the Hatch Act. Public servants who participated in the political processes as allowed by S. 135 would be known as partisan. Once so identified, they would become the target of political parties. Then political, rather than public, purposes would be served. In particular, taxpayers fear:

Government contracts being awarded for political rather than cost and quality considerations;

Promotions being granted for partisan rather than merit criteria;

Government time being used for political projects; and Workers being pressured to support political rather than public ends.

But the taxpayers most fundamental reason for opposing Hatch Act revisions is that the proposed changes would increase the pressure for growth in the Federal government. Government workers already have a phenomenal power to enlarge their bureaucracies, their programs, their pay and their pensions. The proposed Hatch Act revisions would simply skew an already lopsided influence further.

NTU conducted a quick survey of the rules other countries apply to their civil services regarding partisan activities. In those countries with fewer restrictions on partisan activity, such as Bolivia, France and Chile, there have been more problems with corruption. Countries which have established a more nonpartisan civil service, such as Japan and Canada, have experienced fewer problems.

For these and other reasons, NTU encourages you to leave the Hatch Act intact and to vote against revisions proposed in S. 135.

Sincerely,

SHEILA MACDONALD,
Director, Government Relations.

[U.S. Chamber of Commerce, July 25, 1989]

STATEMENT ON HATCH ACT AMENDMENTS BEFORE THE SENATE COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS

(By Teri L. Pierce) [1]

(The U.S. Chamber of Commerce is the world's largest federation of business companies and associations and is the principal spokeman for the American business community. It represents nearly 180,000 businesses and organizations, such as local/state chambers of commerce and trade/professional associations.

(More than 93 percent of the Chamber's members are small business firms with fewer than 100 employees, 45 percent with fewer than 10 employees. Yet, virtually all of the nation's largest companies are also active members. We are particularly cognizant of the problems of smaller businesses, as well as issues facing the business community at large.

(Besides representing a cross section of the American business community in terms of number of employees, the Chamber represents a wide management spectrum by type of business and location. Each major classification of American business—manufacturing, retailing, services, construction, wholesaling, and finance—numbers more than 10,000 members. Yet no one group constitutes as much as 32 percent of the total membership. Further, the Chamber has substantial membership in all 50 states.

(The Chamber's international reach is substantial as well. It believes that global interdependence provides an opportunity, not a threat. In addition to the 59 American Chambers of Commerce Abroad, an increasing number of members are engaged in the export and import of both goods and services, and have ongoing investment activities. The Chamber favors strengthened international competitiveness and opposes artificial U.S. and foreign barriers to international business.

(Positions on national issues are developed by a cross section of its members, serving on committees, subcommittees and task forces. Currently, some 1,800 business people participate in this process.)

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce is pleased to have the opportunity to present its views on proposals to amend the Hatch Act.

The Chamber supports the Hatch Act, which protects federal civil service and postal employees from undue political pressure and coercion, and believes that no law should be enacted to permit the solicitation of financial or any other form of support for political candidates and party or other political organizations by such employees.

The Chamber specifically opposes enactment of S. 135, the Hatch Act Reform Amendments of 1989, now before this Committee.

The Hatch Act was passed 50 years ago to protect federal workers from political pressure by elected and appointed officials. The purpose was to separate the work force from the elected leadership. In much the same way that the civil service has protected federal employees from the "spoils system," the Hatch Act has protected these workers from exploiting their office or being exploited by others. It has been a benign barrier to politicizing the federal work force. The Hatch Act has allowed only nonpartisan political involvement by federal employees.

The Chamber has several concerns about amending the Hatch Act. These include the use of government positions to coerce contractors to contribute to candidates; the exertion of pressure on citizens dealing with the Internal Revenue Service (IRS); agencies that dispense grants or loans having undue influence over applicants; and, particularly, the potential abuse of the federal worker.

It is well known that exertion of political pressure upon and by the New Deal's Works Progress Administration, which became so politicized that the public rebelled against the resulting corruption, prompted the enactment of the Hatch Act in 1939. However, practices prohibited by the act were not unique to that era.

In 1801, President Thomas Jefferson viewed with dissatisfaction government employees' "taking active parts in the election of public functionaries." While upholding the right of such an employee to vote as a qualified citizen, Jefferson said, "it is expected that he will not attempt to influence the vote of others, nor take part in the business of electioneering, that being deemed inconsistent with the spirit of the Constitution and his duties to it." Restrictions proposed by the Jefferson Administration were never implemented.

The Pendleton Act of 1883 established the Civil Service Commission (CSC) and provided that federal employees under the classified service were free from political assessment and politically motivated removal and were forbidden to participate in politics. The classified service over which the CSC then had authority constituted about 10 percent of the total executive work force.

In 1901, President Theodore Roosevelt issued Presidential Civil Service Rule No. 1, prohibiting all individuals in the classified service from taking "an active part in political management or political campaigns." Roosevelt was frustrated as a Civil Service Commissioner by the CSC's lack of enforcement authority over a system in which only 25 percent of the federal employees were classified, while the spoils system controlled appointments to 75 percent of all federal offices. This rule became law with the enactment of the Hatch Act in 1939.

In signing the Hatch Act into law, President Franklin D. Roosevelt said, "improper political practices can be eliminated only by imposition of rigid statutory regulations and penalties by Congress."

In 1973, the Supreme Court, in upholding for the third time the Hatch Act's constitutionality, declared, "it is in the best interest of the country, indeed essential, the federal service should depend on meritious performance rather than political service. . . ."

Supporters of the bill are quick to mention penalties for missing the new-found privileges that it would grant. The envisioned enforcement should be compared with the enormously difficult job of enforcing laws relating to sexual harassment. Innuendo and subtlety are extremely difficult to document.

Violations can be expected to occur, and large numbers may be undetected and unsolved. The American taxpayer will suffer because the productivity of the federal work force will suffer.

If the federal worker were truly disenfranchised as a participation in politics, Congressional reformation might be necessary. However, federal workers can actively participate—the law only restricts partisan activity. Under the Hatch Act, federal employees may:

Join political clubs;

Contribute money to political candidates and organizations;

Sign nominating petitions;

Campaign for or against ballot propositions;

Attend political fundraising functions;

Wear badges or buttons;

Register voters;

Express opinions; and

Register and vote.

The major prohibitions of the Hatch Act are:

Soliciting campaign funds from fellow workers;

Using federal office for political purposes;

Taking an active part in partisan campaigns; and

Running for office on a partisan ticket.

Federal workers simply will not have the necessary protection from political harassment if the Hatch Act amendments are adopted. Therefore, if Congress enacts these changes, the Chamber believes that Congress should immediately establish a panel to determine the impact of these amendments on the operation of federal offices. Federal employees should be surveyed in a manner that insures anonymity to ascertain their views on the proposed changes prior to enactment.

In its April 12, 1989 analysis of the impact of amending the Hatch Act, the U.S. Department of Justice said:

Any relaxation of the Hatch Act's politicking ban will substantially dimish the protections which federal employees currently enjoy against political pressure, while affording no realistic expectation that the void thus created can be filled by the federal criminal justice system. The Department of Justice remains convinced that nothing short of an absolute bar on partisan political activities by federal civil service employees will adequately protect the public's interest in the fair and impartial administration of government programs and policies and the employees themselves from more or less subtle pressure by their superiors. Two principles central to the operation of the Executive Branch—the nonpartisan administration and enforcement of federal laws, and the advancement in federal service based solely on merit—would certainly be threatened and could well be extinguished.

The U.S. Office of Personnel Management expressed similar concerns:

Permitting partisan involvement makes an employee vulnerable to indirect influence to support actively the party or candidate favored by his superiors. Thus, voluntary political participation, if permitted, could become required participation. Under current law, it is well known that Federal and Postal Service employees cannot serve partisan political purposes. These employees are secure in the knowledge that they need not respond to political requests or suggestions. Eliminating the prohibitions against partisan political management and partisan political management and partisan political campaigning would destroy this protective fabric. The current restrictions on partisan political participation are indispensable to the efficiency, integrity, and independence of both Federal and Postal employees. Moreover, they provide the most significant protection against political coercion and the encroachment of political influence within the Federal Civil Service as well as the Postal Service.

In the October 12, 1987 Washington Post, a federal worker discussing office contributions of all types concluded, "Please Congress, don't add 'Give to the Party of your choice.' . . . There are lots of emotional pitches to give, and I would rather work at the office and contemplate my political orientation in the privacy of my own home where I don't have to consider what my boss will think." One suspects that this person speaks for a large segment of the government work force.

To remove the protection of the Hatch Act would send the U.S. government back down the road of the spoils system and politicization of federal agencies. In the words of President Gerald Ford, "If this bill were to become law, I believe pressures would be brought to bear on federal employees in extremely subtle ways beyond the reach of any anti-coercion statute. . . ."

The Chamber knows no compelling reason to amend the Hatch Act. While it is true that there are certain restrictions on federal workers' political involvement, it is also true that they are a unique group of employees. their job is the efficient operation of the federal government, with equal treatment of all taxpayers regardless of political persuasion. The Hatch Act amendments will remove protections from federal workers and from taxpayers.

Congress should act to strengthen government by rejecting the Hatch Act amendments. Federal workers need and want a harassment-free workplace. The American taxpayer deserves no less than top performance. The Hatch Act was passed to cure the serious problem of political coercion in the federal work force. S. 135 would allow that problem to reemerge.

STATEMENT OF THE INTERNATIONAL PERSONNEL MANAGEMENT ASSOCIATION ON THE HATCH ACT REFORM AMENDMENTS

The International Personnel Management Association (IPMA) has carefully evaluated the "Hatch Act Reform Amendments" that would permit all off-duty Federal career civil service employees to engage in a variety of partisan political activities currently prohibited by the Hatch Act. We have concluded that the proposed legislation is not in the public interest and should not be enacted.

By way of introduction, IPMA is an organization representing over 1,300 member agencies that include civil service commissions, merit system boards and personnel departments at the Federal, state and local levels of government. The Association also represents 55,000 individuals, primarily human resource professionals and managers in the public sector and educators in the fields of public and personnel administration. IPMA's objective is to develop an interest in sound human resource management and provide a focus and a forum for the discussion and exchange of views among practitioners and theoreticians throughout the United States and abroad.

The Association is concerned that (1) the involvement of career civil service employees in partisan political activities will erode citizen confidence that their laws and regulations are being impartially enforced and (2) public programs and services continue to be delivered on a nonpartisan basis without regard to the recipients' political beliefs or affiliations.

In passing the Hatch Act originally, the Congress determined that partisan political activity by Federal career civil servants and those in state government who administer Federal grant-in-aid programs must be limited if public institutions are not only to function, but also to appear to function, fairly and effectively. The Congress sought to establish a careful balance between the right of a Federal employee, as an individual, to participate in the political process, and the necessity for the country to have a nonpartisan, politically neutral civil service to administer and implement its laws. It prohibited activities that could coerce Federal career civil servants and their state government counterparts into giving up their political independence in order to retain their employment and advance in their careers. If the proposed legislation is passed, we are concerned that the career civil servant's visible participation in partisan political activities, even when not on duty, will subvert the Congress' initial intent and erode citizen confidence in the impartiality of its civil servants.

Administration of the public's business is sufficiently frought with the opportunity for honest disagreement now, without introducing the notion that governmental decisions, whether favorable or unfavorable to the claimant, petitioner or applicant, are colored by political favoritism. A number of examples of the potential for unnecessary conflict come easily to mind:

Taxpayers contesting Internal Revenue Service decisions concerning tax liabilities;

Foundations seeking tax-exempt or other special tax status;

Claimants contesting Social Security Administration decisions over benefits or disability determinations;

Mine owners contesting decisions by the Mine Safety and Health Administration;

Farmers and small business men contesting decisions over eligibility for Federal or state assistance;

Grant applicants who are denied funding;

Unsuccessful bidders on public contracts;

Unsuccessful applicants for government employment or career advancement in the civil service; and Unemployment insurance applicants who are denied compensation.

Why even suggest the possibility that those who are responsible for making these kinds of decisions are anything but impartial and a political in their deliberations?

Another concern is the potential effect such a statutory change could have on relationships between political appointees, of any Administration, and the career civil servants upon whom they must rely to carry out their policies and programs. Cooperation between the policy makers and implementers is essential to effective governing. Again, it is not difficult to envision a situation, allowed by the proposed legislation, in which a career civil servant runs for political office as a partisan candidate, is defeated and returns to work. This person may encumber a position that is proximate or reports directly to a political appointee who is of the opposing political party. Will it be possible for the political appointee to have full trust and confidence in that career civil servant? If not, what effect will that have on the ability of the civil servant to function effectively and what impact will this have on the organization's ability to perform its mission?

As an Association, we are concerned with the integrity of legally mandated merit systems. The intent in legislating such systems was to ensure that decisions concerning hiring, development and advancement of its employees be made on the basis of the relative merits of the competing applicants, rather than on the basis of their political affiliations or other nonmerit factors. We believe this change in the law would send the wrong message and that, wittingly or unwittingly, there will evolve the perception that hiring, promotions, developmental assignments and performance bonuses are best earned by demonstrating the "right politics."

We recognize that the proposed legislation attempts to incorporate protections to prevent problems of the kind referred to above. However, the atmosphere in which employees work can contain politically coercive elements even though no legally definitive evidence of coercion can be demonstrated. It is simply not possible to protect career civil servants from reprisal for overt partisan political activities. That protection is not possible in the current environment where political activities are, at most, covert and the statutory protections are strong; how much more difficult will it be to assure that protection in an environment where "off duty" partisan political activity is permitted? Is the political appointee really expected to be able to ignore political activity that is adverse to the interests of his/her party or in conflict with his/her ideological beliefs because it occurred after working hours? We believe that is far too much to expect of anyone.

The principle of political neutrality for career civil servants is a commonly accepted tenet of public employment, both in the United States and in other countries. A study of civil service laws by the United Nations concluded that "the political neutrality of the civil service is a fundamental feature of multi-party democracy and is essential for its efficient operation." [1] Concern over the politicization of the civil service was expressed as far back in our history as the presidency of Thomas Jefferson. The excesses that led to the enactment of the Hatch Act in 1939 are well documented, and the need to insulate the civil service from partisan politics is as compelling today as it was in 1939, if not more so. The Hatch Act does not disenfranchise career civil servants; what it does is preclude them from labelling themselves as Republican or Democrat civil servants and making targets of themselves for public suspicion or political reprisal.

Close to three million Federal career civil servants, and a similarly significant number of state employees, are covered by the Hatch Act. They do not consider themselves second-class citizens and most of them are not petitioning for emancipation. In general, career civil servants accept the terms of their government employment voluntarily. They fear political coercion and unlawful discrimination far more than they covet the chance to engage in partisan political activities by running for office, attending political conventions or managing political campaigns.

While the proposed legislation appears limited to Federal employees, the potential impact of this legislation on state and local government employees can not be overlooked. A number of states and many local governments have laws restricting partisan political activity by their employees, many of them patterned after the Hatch Act. Modifications to the Federal statute can't help but ultimately affect the protections now afforded state and local government employees.

Over the past several years, we have witnessed an erosion in the confidence of the public in all levels of government. Any legislation that impairs the neutrality of the civil service can only result in a further reduction in the public's confidence. As Justice White noted in the case of National Association of Letter Carriers v. United States Civil Service Commission, "it is not only important that the government and its employees in fact avoid practicing political justice, it is also critical that they appear to the public to be avoiding it if confidence in the system of representative government is not to be eroded to a disastrous extent." [2]

IPMA's concern is that the proposed amendments to the Hatch Act will foster the appearance, if not actually create the possibility, that decisions made by career civil servants can and are being made for partisan political reasons. Such a perception would have a severely negative impact on the ability of career civil servants to carry out their responsibilities to any Administration and to the American public whom they serve.

Mr. GLENN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio is recognized.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I have been in the Senate quite a number of years now, some 15 years, going on my 16th year, and I think rarely have I heard so many bad things attributed to a simple reform that does nothing but try to clarify and simplify and make more workable existing laws.

I want to protect the workers. S. 135, I feel, does protect the workers. I want a law that is understood, No. 1, I want a law that is clear. I think if we have a murky, unclear situation, that can be interpreted in a myraid of different ways, that you set up the stage for either one of two things: Those who would subvert the political process of this country can find a reason under existing law to do it, and know that they probably cannot be pinned down. That is, the people that would intentionally misuse what is permitted right now. The others are people who, because of the lack of clarity of this law, accidentally stumble into something they do unintentionally just because the law lacks clarity, and so they get caught up in it.

If the law is that unclear, if the law is sufficiently vague and sufficiently murky, that it results in either opening a door to intentional misuse of the Hatch Act or opens the door to accidental activity that can be interpreted some way as being against the law, then it seems to me we need to clarify the situation.

[1] Vaughn, Robert G., "Restrictions on the Political Activities of Public Employees, The Hatch Act and Beyond," George Washington University Law Review, Vol. 44, 1976, page 532.

That is all that this S. 135 does. It does not make great changes; it is not some monstrous repeal. What it does is, it very ill clearly states that even what political activity may be permitted under the Hatch Act now, if you are out there working on the job, that even political activity permitted under the Hatch Act now under this new legislation will be prohibited. You cannot do it. That is a better protection for the workers. If they file suit, 3 years in jail and a $5,000 fine can now be levied, if this legislation passes. It increases the penalty, so we strengthen the protections for Government employees.

At the same time, we say off duty—which has, once again, beem very ill defined—away from the workplace, what can they do? Well, we open some of those things up so they can participate to some degree in the political process, like every other American.

But at the same time, we retain in this Senate legislation a strict prohibition against soliciting for political contributions and we prohibit Federal employees from running for public elected office. They can participate in party matters but they cannot run for public political office. That is a clarification. Common Cause says we are trying to repeal, according to my distinguished colleagues. I do not understand that. There is no repeal involved here. I wonder who has read this thing and who has not.

As I said the other day and what was quoted in the paper this morning, I do not have it in front of me, when the Hatch Act comes up or the lines are drawn, the people put on their helmets and the shots start to be fired, all before we even know what is involved in this. S. 135 to me is a bill that basically clarifies. It does not repeal, whatever anyone may say.

The Federal Bar Association says, I am quoting my colleague a few moments ago, that it might make political abuse more likely. How on earth can clarifying the law make abuse more likely? And of all people to be putting that claim up, the Federal Bar Association. Once again, I wonder if they read this thing and who interpreted it for them. How on earth can it make political abuse more likely by clarifying the law and very clearly stating what can be done on the job and what cannot be done, or what cannot be done off the job?

The Federal Bar Association went ahead and said that it would make illegal acts easily identified. They do not want political action—I guess the statement was that they do not want to see political activity, unlawful political activity—I am not sure what was meant with that one. Anyway, the chamber of commerce goes into all sorts of things about the Government coercing contractors and the contributors in loans, applicants being protected, the abuse of workers, and harassment.

They want a harassment-free workplace. That is in quotes, a harassment-free work place. That is exactly what I want. The chamber of commerce should get on board with us on this so we can create a harassment-free workplace. That is exactly what we are trying to do with this legislation by clarifying what can be done and what cannot be done. And a harassment-free workplace is exactly what this provides because it says you cannot have any political activity in the workplace. That was a quote of what was said a few moments ago. They do not want to see the workers abused. This prevents the abuse of the workers. S. 135 does that. They want a clarified situation, they have said. That is exactly what S. 135 provides, is clarification.

The International Personnel Management Association says they want a nonpartisan administration of Government. I agree with that 100 percent.

I would think these organizations would be the ones that would be backing this instead of taking a knee-jerk reaction when the Hatch Act is mentioned. No change, no change. Even though the Hatch Act now, the administration of it, has been in absolute shambles. We repeated over and over on this floor that we have some 3,000 rules and regulations, and you can prove or not prove almost anything you want by which interpretation of these rules and regulations, which interpretation you wish to use to back up whatever you want to do. And all this does is clarify all of this. So we want that nonpartisan Government also.

I would solicit their activity today to look at this once again. Maybe they can change their provision and support this because I think it does exactly what Common Cause talks about they want, what the Federal Bar Association says they want, what the chamber of commerce says they want, and what the International Personnel Management Association says they want. What they want is exactly what this bill does—simplifies, provides clarification, makes it clear if somebody is doing something in the workplace, they are wrong, it cannot be misinterpreted anymore, cannot be intentionally misused by those who would have their own nefarious purposes, less likely anyone can accidentally stumble into accidentally violating a law they did not know about or was so vague they did not know was on the books.

So, those are some general comments. Now let me get back to the specific amendment that is before us now.

This would add the problem with the caucuses that we talked about a couple of days ago. But it does so along with some other things. It also takes action again, or attempts to take action on the union heads action, union heads vote that we already had before us yesterday. And in the proposal by my distinguished colleague on the other side of the aisle, that proposal was voted down 66 to 29. Now we are bringing it up again in this amendment.

We had another amendment yesterday, an amendment to have OPM clarify and simplify some of these interpretations that we have talked about so much and combine that with an education plan. That amendment was voted on, record rollcall vote, and defeated 67 to 30. So that is brought up again in a proposed amendment.

It does add a clarification on the caucuses, which I think would be corrected by this legislation anyway. Because the bill provides for the kind of thing that would be a protection in the caucuses.

But the part I object to most in this amendment and the basic reason why I will oppose it and do oppose it strongly is that this is a substitute for all of S. 135. It strikes out everything we are trying to do to clarify this and takes these things up one at a time—caucuses, the union heads, OPM clarifying.

If we were to go through all of the different interpretations under the Hatch Act that have been made over a number of decades, if we are to do that, this will be a never-ending task, because interpretations will be probably coming out as fast as we can correct them. We would have at least hundreds of interpretations to be made here on the floor, possibly even thousands. The House would have their activity going on the same way, and people would be sending us messages and letters as to what interpretation has been used against them individually in their particular part of the country and where does that stop. There is no end to it if we go down that route.

Mr. President, S. 135, which this would eliminate, this amendment would basically strike, strikes everything in S. 135 and substitutes these provisions on the caucuses, union heads, and the OPM clarification and education plan, two of which we already voted on yesterday. This would substitute those limited number of things for everything in S. 135. So I must strongly oppose this, Mr. President.

I do not know whether anyone else wishes to debate this or not. I would be prepared to move to a tabling motion at an appropriate time and we could voice vote this if this is agreeable with my colleague across the aisle

Mr. ROTH. I am ready to proceed.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I move to table the amendment proposed by my distinguished colleague from Delaware.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DASCHLE). The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. GLENN] to table the amendment of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. ROTH].

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to.

Mr. ROTH. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 1584

(Purpose: To provide a civil private right of action for Federal employees against political coercion)

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. ROTH] proposes an amendment numbered 1584.

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 6, insert between lines 3 and 4 the following new section:

"§ 7326. Private right of action for employees against political coercion

"(a) In addition to any other available remedy, an employee may file a civil cause of action in any United States district court against any person violating the provisions of section 610 of title 18 relating to such employee.

"(b) An employee filing an action under subsection (a) may be awarded no more than $5,000 in damages for each such violation.".

On page 6, insert between lines 11 and 12, immediately after the matter preceding line 12, the following:

"7326. Private right of action for employees against political coercion.".

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, the other day the committee chairman admonished us all to read the bill. That is very good advice for those who support this bill as well.

The key provision of the Hatch Act forbids any Federal employee to take an active part in political management or in political campaigns. The key provision of S. 135 does the exact opposite. It expressly authorizes forbidden conduct. It makes virtue out of vice. It encourages what is today forbidden. it states that a Federal employee may take an active part in political management or in political campaigns.

The Hatch Act and the bill contradict one another perfectly. Yet proponents insist on applying a salve to their burning conscience, saying that S. 135 is not a repeal of the Hatch Act but only a reform. Read the bill.

Another fiction is that S. 135 forbids the coercion of a Federal employee to participate in political activity. This will surprise everyone who has not read the bill, which I suspect is just about everyone.

The common line on S. 135 is that it authorizes active participation in political campaigns but forbids the coercion of Federal employees, thus remedying the evil the bill might otherwise cause.

Well, where is the prohibition of coercion? Is it on Page 1 of the bill? Page 2? Page 3? Page 4? Page 5? Page 6? Page 7? Page 8? Page 9? Where is it?

Forced to respond, proponents will point to one little clause on lines 7 through 9 of page 4. It states that an "employee may not use his official authority or influence for the purpose of interfering with or affecting the result of an election.

Where is the word "coercion"? Does not this provision really envision a Department of Labor statistician who provides government data on employment to one Presidential candidate but no the other? If this clause forbids coercion, it is certainly abstruse. Why is not the word "coercion" used if coercion is, in fact, forbidden?

The word in the Cloakroom is that this bill is a political power grab. Now that for the first time in the history of polling a majority of Americans identify themselves as Republicans, the Democrats have decided to perpetuate their majority status through a legislative skewing of the political process. The reasons for the bill that were stated for the record have already been proved false. The committee report only gives two reasons for the bill—only two. The first reason is the prosecution of three union leaders. The second is the confusion over Hatch Act regulations.

Naively, I spent all of yesterday addressing these concerns, assuming that these reasons—the only reasons stated—were the reasons for the bill. But the Senate rejected my amendment to simplify and clarify the Hatch Act regulations. And the Senate rejected my amendment to exempt union presidents from the Hatch Act and thus immunize them from prosecution.

So the only conclusion I can reach is that the cloakroom scuttlebutt is correct. This bill is a political power grab, an attempt to gain partisan political advantage, the opening salvo in the campaign—finance—reform debate.

If these concerns are even partially valid, then one must worry about outside coercion of Federal employees. But read the bill. There is not one word in the bill about outside coercion of employees. Employees are forbidden to use official authority to affect election results. Whatever this means, it clearly does not apply to outside coercion. Read the bill.

There are other defects in this clause as well. The clause, by its terms, does not address the expectations in specific cases that an employee will do what other employees are doing. Read the bill.

The clause, by its terms, does not address the subtle pressures that will inevitably be brought to bear on a particular employee. Read the bill.

The clause, by its terms, does not address post-election reprisals. How could a post-election reprisal affect the result of an election? The clause does not apply. The reprisal may be direct or indirect, harsh or subtle, flagrant, or disguised. It does not matter. Read the bill.

Moreover, the clause if my colleagues read it carefully, may not even reach coercion. We, in opposition, may have conceded too much in suggesting that the evils wrought by the legislation were addressed by a simple anti-coercion statute. But we have not read the bill. If one employee coerces another, how does that "interfere with * * * the result of an election"? Or how does that "affect the result of an election"? Read the bill.

The bill leaves the Federal employee naked against coercion. That is not all that surprising. What surprises me is that the bill does not really try to prohibit coercion in any affective way.

We made all these points before. We made them in our minority views in the Senate report. Read the second paragraph of page 21. We made these observations in our views in the Senate report filed in the 100th Congress.

What surprises me is that the proponents do not care. They do not care about federal employees or the first amendment values not to be politically coerced. This is a power grab. Forget the sentimentality about eliminating discrimination. Proponents wish to build a political machine.

While proponents have their eyes on the political prize, we are deeply concerned about the impact of this legislation on the public, the Government, and the employee.

I have already voiced my concern about the nature of coercion, how subtle and undetectable it can be. Whether we recall the knights who sought to please King Henry II of England or the GS-15's at the Labor Department competing for the same promotion, it is common that one suffer coercion without anyone actually coercing.

But if the majority insists on perpetrating this shameful legislation, something must be done to protect the employee when coercion is overt. The bill does not protect against coercion, as I have demonstrated before. Something must be done to remedy those cases when outright coercion may be proved.

Yesterday, Senator ROBB offered an amendment that offered criminal sanctions against coercion. It is interesting that the author did not make it a crime to violate the provisions of this bill. That would have been almost worthless, as I have made clear. Senator ROBB's analysis, evident in his amendment, validates what I have said. In order to protect Federal employees from coercion, it was necessary to write an entirely new prohibition and make its violation a crime.

I am not sure that is was clear to all what this amendment does. It not only prohibits coercion by Federal employees, it prohibits coercion by any person against Federal employees. At least this amendment tries to do the job of protecting the employee even if that is an impossible mission in the circumstances of this bill.

Now we are all aware that the burden of proof in criminal cases is proof beyond a reasonable doubt—a most difficult standard to meet. Moreover, the isolated case of coercion here or there will probably not come to the fore of the docket of the Justice Department's Criminal Division, which has so many heinous crimes to prosecute.

Therefore, today I offer an amendment to provide a civil remedy—one which the aggrieved employee can bring on his own—to right the wrong of coercion. It tracks the standard of the Robb amendment verbatim but allows the aggrieved party to sue in Federal court to recover damages.

I believe that the amendment fills a gaping hole in this legislation. I am disappointed that the task of improving this legislation falls upon the bill's opponents. However, it appears that only the opponents have read the bill.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio is recognized.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, our rhetoric on this bill is getting a little harsh when we say the people who put the bill together need to read it, implying that we have not read it yet. Let me address what has been read and what has not been read and what has been agreed to.

My learned opponent says we should cover coercion. Where is it covered? Why do we not cover coercion? I ask my distinguished colleague where he was yesterday. Because when an amendment was proposed that dealt specifically with coercion, it was agreed to on a voice vote, I believe with his support, here on the floor yesterday.

We recognized that coercion might come up. Senator ROBB, Senator WARNER, and myself submitted an amendment yesterday. We called it the Robb amendment. It was. He originated it. It applies to the act, but it is a new section which was accepted on a voice vote yesterday. Talk about dealing with coercion, let me read this. It is short. "Section 610. Coercion of Political Activity." That is the title. That section says:

> It shall be unlawful for any person to intimidate, threaten, command, or coerce, or attempt to intimidate, threaten, command, or coerce, any employee of the federal government as defined in 5 U.S.C. 7322(1), as amended, to engage in, or not to engage in, any political activity, including, but not limited to, voting or refusing to vote for any candidate or measure in any election, making or refusing to make any political contribution, or working or refusing to work on behalf of any candidate * * *.

Listen to this:

> Any person who violates this section shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than 3 years or both.

That increases the penalties for violations under the Hatch Act, and specifically violations for coercion. It is even defined here. That was agreed to yesterday and is part of S. 135.

So what is proposed this morning is basically that be altered somewhat just to give some additional rights for direct personal suits from one person to another, an aggrieved party against a supervisor, or whatever, if there is an attempt to coerce.

I think this is adequately covered, Mr. President.

Remarks were made about what is being said in the cloakrooms; that this is the opening salvo of some great campaign to do away with all sorts of things; that this is the beginning of financial reform; that this is a first step to do a lot of dire things that are political in nature themselves. I repeat what I said awhile ago. Rarely have so many bad things been attributed to such a very simple reform bill, and this is one more to put on our list.

There is nothing like that going on. This is not a skewing of the political process. It is a correction so the people will know what the political process is enough that they can know whether they are going to get in trouble by doing something or not. It still keeps the protections in this bill that we have had in the past.

As far as the basic coercion provisions, those are in the original Hatch Act that we are doing nothing but amending with this legislation. That is what the Hatch Act was all about. Whether it is in there or not, we certainly covered it yesterday with the Robb amendment that was agreed to on a voice vote here yesterday afternoon. There were no dissenting comments, I believe, raised; no dissenting votes were recorded after the vote to show anyone felt strongly enough about it to show they wished to be recorded against that voice vote.

Mr. President, I do not see the amendment is necessary at all. We already have covered this, as far as dealing with coercion. I do not believe it is necessary to add this additional power for one person to sue directly against another person when we already provide a $5,000 fine and 3 years in jail, as a possibility, for any person who violates this section. I think if there is going to be a deterrent in law against people taking a false action, that is it.

Mr. President, I do not know whether we are prepared to move to a vote on this or not. I am prepared, unless my distinguished colleague has additional remarks.

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, I would like to make a few brief remarks.

Mr. GLENN. I yield the floor.

Mr. ROTH. What I said in my opening statement, Mr. President, is that the Robb amendment filled a void in the legislation. It is true that the Robb amendment includes the word "coercion."

My complaint has been that until that amendment was offered, there was no such provision, there was no means of protecting the employee from political coercion.

As good as the Robb amendment is—the Senator is right, in the voice vote, I did approve of the Robb amendment—I think the fact is—and most people I know would share my concern—that by making it a criminal violation, it will offer very little protection to the individual employee, for the reasons I outlined earlier.

Mr. President, the distinguished chairman of the Governmental Affairs Committee and I have sat in many hearings in which we have received testimony and expressed concern that criminal violations are not prosecuted by the Justice Department, for the simple reason that they do not have the personnel or the resources to prosecute every case that comes before them. As a result, in many cases they take no action. And as a result, the wrong, whatever it may be, goes unpunished.

This lapse in legal remedies is what I am seeking to correct in my amendment before the Senate at the present time. Recognizing that the number of prosecutions which can be undertaken by the Justice Department is limited, we are proposing that the individual employee have the right to bring suit, have the right to be compensated in some way where they are the victims of political coercion.

It seems to me that this is a very simple and fair amendment, one that strengthens the legislation. I am still concerned that the legislation is written in such a manner that it does not outlaw political coercion in any effective way. It brings me back to my basic point that the legislation is a repeal of the Hatch Act. It goes 180 degrees in the wrong direction. The employee is not protected.

Let me reiterate briefly, and then I will close off the debate, Mr. President. Some time ago we enacted legislation entitled the Small Fraud Civil Remedies Act. That very piece of legislation was enacted into law for the same reasons I am discussing here today. There was concern that there were too many abuses and frauds going unpunished because the Justice Department again did not have the personnel and resources to take action. As a result, we set up an alternative civil remedy that would enable, again, these cases to be prosecuted. The reasons for that remedy and this are the same.

Let me also point out, Mr. President, that the same lesson was demonstrated just in the last couple of weeks in the Governmental Affairs Committee, when we held a hearing on the problem of the IGs wanting to do work that the FBI could not do.

So it seems to me that the amendment I propose is a simple one, a desirable one, and a necessary one because it will make effective the enforcement of the provisions of the Robb amendment.

I yield the floor.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, before I respond briefly, I would like to make a correction in some remarks I made a little while ago, in response to the distinguished floor manager on the minority side, when I responded to his comments about Common Cause, the Federal Bar Association, the Chamber of Commerce, and the International Personnel Management Associations, and their remarks.

I believe the remarks which they had made about coercing and money, and so on, were made basically on the House bill, on the legislation that has been passed over there. I wanted to note that because if that is the case, I want to point out to those people that their opposition to what we are trying to do here may be ill founded because we are not talking about that legislation. What we are talking about is legislation passed in the Senate. The House bill does some things that are very questionable from the Senate standpoint.

So I want to make sure that that is understood.

Let me respond a little more directly. With the amendment that we have before us by the distinguished Senator from Delaware, it would seem to me that you open the floodgates to the filing of hundreds, perhaps even thousands and thousands, of lawsuits and for no purpose as far as deterring violations under the Hatch Act.

Each time a person does not get a raise, will there be some who will say, "Well, I was coerced and therefore I did not respond to that coercion. And so that is the reason I did not get a raise and that is unfair, and I am filing a suit"? Each time a person does not get an assignment they want, they will say, "Well, that person tried to coerce me, and I would not go along with it. I was Simon Pure on that, and I would not go along with that. And so now I am being penalized, and I will file suit."

Or each time a person does not get a transfer they want to some new place, when there is a new job open someplace and they are refused a transfer, they say, "Well, OK. They tried to coerce me and did not, and they are trying to hold that against me, and I did not get that transfer," or whatever, and so they file suit.

S. 135, with the amendment I read a few months ago, deals very strongly, forcefully, impartially, with anyone who tries to coerce another person in Federal employment, whatever that coercion may be. They can get up to 3 years in jail; they can get a $5,000 fine, and I do not think that is too small. I think that is pretty hefty, and if anything is going to deter prohibited activity under the Hatch Act, increasing the penalty to that amount should certainly do it. That is in the legislation before us.

So, Mr. President, if anyone else wishes to speak on this, I will be happy to have them do so. Otherwise, I would be prepared, at whatever time is agreeable to the distinguished Senator from Delaware, to move to table.

Mr. ROTH. I just have one comment, Mr. President. I would like to point out that the Common Cause letter from which I read was dated September 13, 1989. We have a more recent letter, dated May 2, 1990. The most recent letter, of course, came within the week.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the letter dated May 2, 1990, from Common Cause be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Common Cause,
Washington, DC, May 2, 1990.

DEAR SENATOR: The Senate is soon expected to take action on legislation to amend the Hatch Act which for 50 years has protected federal employees from inappropriate political pressures. Common Cause strongly urges you to oppose S. 135, the Hatch Act Amendments of 1989. This bill seeks to make basic changes in the current Hatch Act restrictions on partisan political activity by federal workers, opening the door to implicit coercion, and abandons the fundamental concept of an unpoliticized civil service.

The House-passed bill, H.R. 20, would repeal Hatch Act protections and for the first time in 50 years allow federal civil service and postal employees to participate in partisan political activity. For example, federal workers could run as candidates in partisan elections, serve as officers of a political party, raise partisan campaign contributions, manage campaigns, and administer political action committees (PACs). The only restraint is that the partisan activity would have to occur during off-hours. Common Cause opposed the passage of H.R. 20.

S. 135 also proposes major changes in the Hatch Act, lifting most restrictions on partisan political activity. Like the House bill, a federal employee would be permitted, among other things, to serve as an officer of a political party or a PAC, become a public campaign official for a candidate, and run as a delegate to a national convention. The Senate bill does prohibing federal employees from running for partisan political office and from soliciting contributions for partisan candidates. However, it allows government workers to solicit their colleagues for contributions for their own federal employee PACs.

Repeal of the Hatch Act's basic protections, as proposed in S. 135, would increase the potential for widespread abuse and open the way for implicit coercion against which there is no real protection. With basic restrictions on partisan activity repealed, no procedural or other safeguards will be sufficient to protect against subtle forms of political favoritism or coercion of federal workers.

It is important to recognize that under the current Hatch Act, federal workrs are already permitted to engage in various political activities. For example, they may make political contributions to candidates, serve as rank-and-file members of political parties, and engage in nonpartisan political activities. It is only the most active levels of partisan participation from which they are currently barred. In drawing this line, we believe that the current Hatch Act strikes an appropriate balance between the federal worker's ability to participate in political activities and the public's right to fair and impartial administration of government.

Common Cause recognizes that the current regulations governing administration of the Hatch Act are complicated. There may be ways to clarify and simplify for workers the degree of participation they are permitted under the Hatch Act without lifting the basic restrictions on partisan activity. We would urge the Senate to instead explore this possibility. As a core principle, however, a careful balance must be struck between an individual's First Amendment right of free speech and association and the public's right to impartial administration of government. We believe S. 135 upsets this balance and would open the possibility of a dangerously politicized civil service.

The Hatch Act was designed to ensure that the federal government is administered in a fair and impartial manner. We agree with the U.S. Supreme Court which stated, in upholding the constitutionality of the Act, that "it is in the best interest of the country, indeed essential, that federal service should depend upon meritorious performance rather than political service * * *."

Common Cause strongly believes this important integrity-in-government measure should not be repealed. We strongly oppose S. 135 and other proposals that would repeal necessary prohibitions on partisan political activity by federal employees.

Sincerely,

FRED WERTHEIMER,
President.

Mr. GLENN. If the Senator will yield for a question, did it deal specifically with S. 135, or was it talking in general about this area?

Mr. ROTH. I might say both the new letter and the older letter of 1989 refer specifically to S. 135, and of course the S. 135 reported out in 1989 was the same as the one we have before us.

Mr. GLENN. That is right.

Mr. ROTH. I would also point out that the same is true of the statement of the Chamber of Commerce. It was given in testimony in front of the committee in this Congress. If you read the letter from the Federal Bar Association which we quoted, those points of objection are still contained in S. 135, and are applicable to the current situation.

Mr. President, we have previously included in the RECORD each of these letters.

Mr. GLENN. We will review those. I had some erroneous information then. I stand corrected if those are the dates, and so on, that they specifically referred to S. 135.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate?

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I move to table the amendment by the Senator from Delaware.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from Delaware.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to.

Mr. PRYOR. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, I rise today to express my support for S. 135, the Hatch Act Reform Amendments of 1989.

For more than a century, the idea that Federal employees should not be involved in partisan politics has been a fundamental element of the civil service system. This concept of neutrality was formalized in the Hatch Act, a wide-ranging prohibition on political participation which was passed in 1939. The act represents the culmination of repeated efforts, which began in the early days of the Nation, to establish a nonpartisan civil service. An underlying rationale for this idea is that efficiency in Government service requires a lack of partisanship in its administration.

The Hatch Act was enacted more than 40 years ago, to prevent political appointees from using political coercion in the workplace. In so doing it restricted the political activities of employees in the executive branch and the U.S. Postal Service.

More than 3,000 regulatory rulings and decisions have been written to implement the act. Unfortunately many of them are confusing and even conflicting. Decisions are not published, nor are they readily available. This further adds to the confusion about what is permitted and what is not permitted. For example, this complex law allows Federal employees to speak publicly on political subjects, but not at a political gathering; they may attend a political convention, but not serve as a delegate; they may sign a nominating petition, but not circulate it; they can place a bumper sticker on their car, but they cannot give one to a friend—and more.

Much has changed since the enactment of the original act. We no longer have a spoils system, and the need for the Hatch Act is no longer apparent. Since the law was originally passed, other more effective civil and criminal statutes have been enacted which protect employees from intimidation and coercion.

To this date, 41 States allow broader political freedoms for State and local public employees: Alabama, Alaska, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, Florida, Hawaii, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New Mexico, New York, North Carolina, North Dakota, Oregon, Rhode Island, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Texas, Utah, Vermont, Virginia, Washington, West Virginia, Wisconsin, and Wyoming.

The purpose of S. 135 is to provide for Federal civilian employees to participate voluntarily, as private citizens, in the political processes of the Nation and to protect such employees and the general citizenry from improper political solicitations. Over 51 Members of the Senate, including myself, are cosponsors of this legislation. I believe that this legislation emphasizes the value of political participation by ordinary citizens in a democracy.

The Governmental Affairs Committee held two days of hearings on the Hatch Act in the 100th Congress. Much of the testimony focused on the fact that under current law, Federal civilian and postal workers must comply with some 3,000 separate administrative rulings about what kinds of political activities are permissible or not. Witnesses testified that this set of rulings has become confusing, illogical, and trivial over years. The measure after careful review and scrutiny passed the committee last year by a vote of 10 to 4.

Mr. President, a big problem with the current Hatch Act is its vagueness. Many Federal employees are discouraged from participating in permitted political activities because of the confusion surrounding what is permitted, and what is not permitted. I believe that S. 135 addresses this concern and spells out clearly and simply the guidelines that Federal employees must follow. Also the existing act is no longer necessary to protect employees from improper patronage because the makeup of the Federal work force has changed since the act's inception. No longer are Federal jobs filled through patronage, but rather through the competitive merit system.

I am concerned about possible political coercion and intimidation of the Federal work force that could arise if the current prohibitions are amended or repealed. I also feel strongly that we must ensure the protection of the American public from a politically active bureaucracy. I voiced these concerns at hearings on this issue held by the Governmental Affairs Committee, of which I am a member.

In response to my concerns and those of other committee members, the committee drafted a revised version of the House-passed bill. The Senate measure differs from the House-passed measure in two significant respects. First, Federal employees would not be allowed to run for partisan political offices except within party organizations and affiliated groups. Second, these employees would not be allowed to solicit political contributions, except within their employee PAC as is allowed under current law. In addition, the measure retains the strong prohibitions, which are also in the House bill, prohibiting coercion and intimidation of or by employees.

I believe this measure strikes the proper balance between protecting the public and the Federal work force from politically motivated coercion and providing Federal employees the right to participate more fully in the political process. Therefore, I support this measure.

S. 135 allows employees to participate in a full range of political activities off duty and off the worksite. Such activities include working phone banks, handing out leaflets, voter registration, putting up yard signs, and participating in political caucuses. It allows employees to solicit, accept, or receive a political contribution from other members of the same Federal or postal employee organization for that organization's multicandidate political action committee, once they are off duty and away from the worksite.

S. 135 does not permit employees to engage in political activities while on duty, in a Federal building, while wearing a uniform or official insignia, or while using a Government vehicle. It does not permit employees to run for any partisan political office at any level; employees to solicit, accept, or receive political contributions from the general public; employees to give a contribution to any person to vote or to refrain from voting; employees to give, solicit, or accept a contribution from or to a superior; and employees to give, solicit, or accept a contribution while in a Government building.

Hatch Act penalties now in place remain and in some cases are strengthened. Anyone violating the restrictions or engaging in prohibited political activities is subject to dismissal from employment, fines, and up to 3 years in jail. These sanctions, coupled with other protections afforded under civil service laws, are strong deterrents.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to support this important legislation. It is a step forward in protecting Federal workers and, at the same time, allowing them their freedoms as guaranteed by the Constitution.

Mr. RUDMAN. Mr. President, I rise today to oppose S. 135. As a member of the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee, I have participated extensively in the debate on this issue. I firmly believe that any relaxation in the provisions of this 50-year-old statute will have dire negative effects on Federal employees, the efficient and fair dispensation of Government services, and public confidence in the Federal Government. Our Nation cannot ill-afford to risk these consequences, especially at a time when public confidence is at such a low ebb.

There are many reasons to oppose S. 135, but I will limit myself today to addressing the three main points most frequently cited by its proponents: The Hatch Act is an anachronism which is irrelevant to the modern Federal work force; the Hatch Act is an unconstitutional infringement on the free speech rights of Federal employees; and, by maintaining penalties against coercion or other abuses of political activity, Federal employees are adequately protected.

To state that the Hatch Act is some kind of irrelevant holdover from the spoils system is to disregard not only historical fact, but current political reality. It is true the Federal work force has changed drastically from 1939 when political patronage was rampant. But it has changed with the help of the Hatch Act, not in spite of it.

It is erroneous to imply that the Hatch Act simply responded to the political abuses at the time of its passage. While the particularly egregious abuses in the Works Progress Administration certainly provided fuel for the enactment of the statute, the need for a politically neutral Federal work force has been recognized since the founding of our government. Thomas Jefferson was one of the first to try to address this concern by issuing an order which stated, in part, that—

[t]he right of any officer to give his vote at election as a qualified citizen is not meant to be restrained * * * [however,] it is expected that he will not attempt to influence the votes of others nor take part in the business of electioneering * * *

This is a succinct description of the current law: Federal employees may cast their own votes and express their own opinions, but they may not engage in political campaigning, the nature of which is clearly designed to influence others.

Since Jefferson's expression of concern, additional efforts were made to establish a nonpartisan Federal work force. The Civil Service Act of 1883, also known as the Pendleton Act, included a provision declaring that "no person in the public service is * * * under any obligations to contribute to any political fund, or to render any right to use his official authority or influence to coerce the political action of any person or body." In a 1907 Executive Order, President Theodore Roosevelt amended this provision to prohibit executive civil servants from using their "official authority or influence for the purpose of interfering with an election or affecting the result thereof." As well-intended as these actions were, Jefferson's goal of a truly politically neutral civil service was not obtained until the Hatch Act became law.

Proponents argue that 1990 is vastly different than 1939, and that the Hatch Act is no longer necessary. But even under current law, political coercion occurs. The fiscal year 1989 report of the Office of Special Counsel, the body charged with enforcing the Act, contains a review of such violations. In one example, the OSC filed complaints charging eight employees of the Niagara Frontier Transportation Authority [NFTA] with engaging in a scheme to coerce other NFTA employees to contribute to various candidates for elective office and a political party. The Merit Systems Protection Board sustained the OSC complaints on all counts, and ordered the removal of three persons as a result. It is clear that even under the current Hatch Act, we must be ever vigilant against the abuse of political power.

One need merely look at the last local election in Arlington, VA, for a preview of life in the Federal Government without a strong Hatch Act. That county's 1987 election featured a sheriff being challenged by one of his former deputies. Following the incumbent's reelection, he gave a "retire now or be demoted" ultimatum to seven of his deputies who had publicly supported the challenger.

This action, which was the subject of a judicial challenge and ultimately settled out of court, is noteworthy only for the sheriff's bluntness. In more subtle forms, it will become the norm if S. 135 becomes law. Politics is an emotionally charged enterprise, and it is all too tempting to use whatever tools are available. This was a fact of life in 1939, and the situation has not changed today.

With regard to the assertions that the Act violates the First Amendment freedoms of Federal employees, this has been directly refuted by the Supreme Court. Both times the Court ruled on this issue, it recognized the dangers associated with unfettered political activity in the civil service. In United States Civil Service Commission versus National Association of Letter Carriers, the court concluded that:

Substantial barriers should be raised against the party in power * * * using the thousands or hundreds of thousands of Federal employees, paid for at public expense, to man its political structure and political campaigns.

The Court further noted that—

[n]either the right to associate nor the right to participate in political activities is absolute.

This statement recognizes the careful balance that the Hatch Act draws between the personal freedom and public good. It is important to remember that Federal employees are not limited in personal expressions of opinion. They may vote, make campaign contributions, attend rallies, put up signs or bumper stickers, and write letters to the editor. They may not, however, engage in campaign activities since these have been shown to compromise the impartiality of the civil service, and thus, the public good.

Finally, the proponents of S. 135 assert that the existing criminal statutes such as 18 U.S.C. 601, dealing with coercion, are adequate to guard against occurrences of abuse. This is not the case for several reasons. First, in cases of political pressure or coercion, the victims, usually subordinates, are hesistant to come forward with complaints. This may be because the employee fears retaliation such as job loss or demotion, or because it may be easier to acquiesce to pressure to participate in a phone bank or envelope stuffing operation than to rock the boat.

Second, conviction under these statutes requires proof of guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, as opposed to the preponderance of evidence standard required under the administrative prohibitions regularly enforced by the Office of Special Counsel. Many times, such abuses occur where no witnesses are present and lack other corroborating evidence is lacking. Furthermore, many of the abuses which will emerge in a civil service unprotected by the Hatch Act will not necessarily be flagrant examples of strong-arming, although some of that will occur. Rather, the abuses will occur on a more subtle level which does not lend itself to prosecution under the criminal code. Peer pressure, while difficult to prove as a matter of fact, is a very real thing with very real effects. Actual pressure from outside parties need not be exerted to create a presumption in favor of political participation. The simple desire to please one's superior may lead an employee to conclude that such participation is necessary for job advancement, or to avoid stagnation or demotion.

The temptation to allow political considerations to interfere with what are supposed to be a political, merit-based decisions will not just lie with an incumbent administration or individual public servants, but also with Members of Congress who are continually running campaigns supported in large part by volunteers. It is easy to imagine some Members, in an effort to help a Federal employee who worked on their campaign, putting pressure on Federal agencies to give those individuals favored treatment. Civil service protections and statutory requirements for decisions on the merits are not much of a hurdle when there are a wide range of subjective factors that must be weighed.

Finally, I would note that most Federal employees, the ostensible beneficiaries of this bill, do not support a change in the status quo. Congressman WOLF, who represents the congressional district with the highest proportion of Federal employees in the Nation, surveyed those employees in preparation for the House debate on this subject. Fully 70 percent of the Federal workers in his district either opposed any change or had no opinion on the matter. The push for this bill is coming from Federal employee union leaders, who represent a minority of the Federal work force, who believe it will enhance their power. What a price to pay for that.

The Hatch Act has worked. This has been recognized by a broad and diverse coalition of individuals and groups, including Common Cause, the American Bar Association, and the Chamber of Commerce. It has also been recognized by President Bush, who has promised to veto this bill. History has shown that the Hatch Act is the only effective way to protect Federal civil servants from political coercion. In addition to the risks this bill poses to Federal employees and the fair dispensation of government services, Congress simply cannot afford to lessen the public's confidence in the Federal Government. Repeal of the Hatch Act would place us firmly on this inadvisable course, and therefore, I strongly urge that the pending legislation be rejected.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I rise today to reiterate my strong support of S. 135, the Hatch Act reform legislation which was reported from the Governmental Affairs Committee on a bipartisan, 10-to-4 vote last fall. I am especially pleased that the full Senate is finally moving to consideration of reforming the outdated, unfair, and regressive Hatch Act. The fact that we have reached this point today is due to the strong support for this legislation by the majority leader, Mr. MITCHELL, as well as the leadership of the chairman of the Governmental Affairs Committee, Mr. GLENN, and the strong, vocal support of Senators STEVENS and PRYOR.

Mr. President, we applaud the blossoming of democracy in Eastern Europe and we cheer the elimination of the Berlin Wall which has separated German from German. But what about the blossoming of democracy in this country? We want democracy for the oppressed peoples of Eastern Europe, yet we deny those same democratic principles to the men and women who work for the American government. It is time, Mr. President, to let democracy blossom in the Federal workplace. It is time, Mr. President, to bring down the Berlin Wall which separates the Nation's Government employees from the American people and the democratic process.

In 1976, during my first campaign for the U.S. Senate, I became sensitized to the discriminatory status that Federal and postal employees face when they come to work for the Government. Since my first term, I have been a strong and outspoken supporter of the efforts to reform this unfair law.

In the past decade, the threat of President Reagan's certain veto of any Hatch Act reform legislation prevented the full Senate from making its voice heard on this issue. I was extremely frustrated by this lack of Senate action and attempted, in the closing hours of fiscal year 1988, to offer Hatch Act reform legislation as an amendment to the fiscal year 1989 District of Columbia appropriations bill. The bill before us today is very similar to my amendment to the D.C. appropriations bill. In fact, the amendment I offered that night was the bill which had been reported out of the Governmental Affairs Committee earlier that year. Our efforts at that time were not successful, but those of us who believe in Hatch Act reform persevered. I testified before the Governmental Affairs Committee in support of these reform efforts in 1988 and I submitted testimony to the committee last year. So I am very pleased that we are here today to debate this important piece of civil rights legislation.

Reform of the 51-year-old Hatch Act is a priority issue for this Nation's nearly 3 million Federal and postal employees. The House passed its version of Hatch Act reform a year ago by a vote of 297 to 90. The legislation before us today is not revolutionary by any stretch of the imagination. As I have stated on many occasions, this legislation does not repeal the Hatch Act, as many of its critics would have the citizens of this country believe. Instead, S. 135 clarifies and strengthens a law which has confused and befuddled Federal employees for far too long.

Today, nearly 80 percent of all Federal civilian jobs are covered by the impartial system of merit and examination. The education level achieved by Government workers is at an all time high, with approximately one-third possessing at least a bachelor's degree.

While the original premise for passage of the Hatch Act was to protect the Federal worker from political coercion, today it is seen as a bureaucratic jumble of conflicting and confusing regulations which have the effect of freezing-out Federal and postal employees who might try to exercise those few political rights that they are allowed under the current law.

I cannot blame them for opting out of a system which says that you can wear a button for a political candidate, but you cannot pass them out. Or that says you can sign a nominating petition, but you cannot circulate a petition yourself. This confusion is compounded and the law belittled, when—in the name of the Hatch Act—regulations are implemented stating that a political campaign sign no larger than 15 inches by 30 inches can be placed on an individual's car, and that lawn signs for a candidate can be no larger than 14 by 22 inches. These trivial regulations render the Hatch Act ludicrous. The Hatch Act itself is actually a confusing compilation of almost 3,000 bureaucratic decisions and other regulations similar in scope and questionable wisdom to the example of the campaign posters.

Mr. President, I have previously used the example of a postmaster in my State of Arizona who spends a portion of his time regulating the activities of a postman under his supervision. This postman has a relative who is a county official. During his off-duty time, the postman understandably wants to help his relative get reelected. As a result of the Hatch Act, however, this man's superviser must spend part of his time—time that is better spent making certain the mail is delivered on a timely basis—ensuring that his employee does not run afoul of the Hatch Act. This postmaster, like so many Federal and postal employees in my State, wants me to do what I can to see that this outdated law is changed.

The bill that is before us is a good, solid, bipartisan piece of legislation. It simply allows Fedreal employees to voluntarily exercise their first amendment rights and engage in political activities on their own time. The two key ideas here are "voluntarily" and "their own time." This Nation's Federal employees are an intelligent group of individuals. They work hard during the day and they will not allow someone else to tell them how they should spend their leisure time.

The Senate bill, of which I am proud to be an original cosponsor, is simple in its application and its reforms. It prohibits Federal and postal employees from engaging in any partisan political activities on the job, in a uniform, or in a Government vehicle or building and allows these employees the choice to engage or not to engage in political activities on their off-duty time. Currently the law has been interpreted to allow certain employees to wear campaign buttons at work. This practice would be prohibited under the Senate bill. Other ambiguities in the current regulations are similarly remedied.

This Nation's Federal employees know the rules and regulations which govern their activities. I know this because they tell me loudly and clearly when Congress is tampering with their benefits or trying to change their retirement. Under a reformed Hatch Act, they would know if someone was trying to coerce them into donating to a particular candidate or engaging in political activity on the job. They would not let someone else do something to spoil one of their hard-earned benefits or make life difficult for themselves and their peers. It a superviser were to try to get them to do something they know is not right under a reformed Hatch Act, they would know where to go to ensure that even this subtle pressure were stopped.

These specific prohibitions make a reformed Hatch Act self-policing. A simplified Hatch Act would provide postal and Federal employees the opportunity to make their concerns known to their elected representatives—if they choose to do so. If we, as elected officials, do not heed their calls they would then have the right to take action to make a change. This is a right that every other American already possesses.

The fact that the vast majority of civil service jobs fall under the merit system should reduce the fears of some that a large body of workers can be mobilized to work for a particular individual or party. As a matter of fact, it was the Reagan administration which chose not to comply with the courts on the issue of formulating full and fair civil service examinations for employment applicants. According to OPM, about 40 percent of the people hired in recent years—almost 4,000 employees in 1987—were hired without the benefit of competitive examination. I find it odd that many of those who have been so loud in voicing their fears of a politicized system under a reformed Hatch Act have been the beneficiaries from the loophole in the civil service system which allows so many political appointees.

This legislation provides strong penalties for violations of the reformed Hatch Act. I have long believed that clearly defined penalties for violating a law are the best deterrent against breaking that law.

Thus, the bill before us today is a good bill. It clarifies the distinction between what on-duty and off-duty activities are allowed. It specifies the penalties for violations of the act. It strengthens the merit system and enhances the self-policing aspects inherent in the bill. And it improves the American political process by allowing one of the most politically engaged segments of the population access to the country's political system.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I urge my colleagues in the Senate to stop treating America's Federal and postal employees as second-class citizens and to embrace this Hatch Act reform legislation. it is a good, balanced, and bipartisan piece of legislation which would restore long denied first amendment rights to a group which serves this Nation daily. To those who fear that Hatch Act reform will bring coercion, I would state that coercion takes many forms and is undoubtedly present today under this ill defined and arbitrary law. Instead, the Senate should put itself on the record as an advocate for good government, fair government, and equitable government.

Mr. PRYOR addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I wonder if it would be possible at this time to ask the distinguished managers of the bill which is the pending business before the Senate, if I might be allowed to address the Senate on another subject for not to exceed 15 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. PRYOR] is recognized.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I thank the Chair. I also thank the distinguished chairman of the Governmental Affairs Committee for allowing me this opportunity, and also the Senator from Delaware [Mr. ROTH].

Mr. President, a couple of weeks ago the noted syndicated columnist George Will sadly noted in his article the S&L debacle is "the sort of murky mess about which there is no focused public opinion. So no polls tell the Bush administration to behave properly. So it does not."

Mr. President, in this morning's New York Times, on the front page, we saw another story about this continuing fiasco, the S&L debacle. Let me, if I might, Mr. President, read a headline from page 1 of the New York Times of this morning: "Bush Names Choice to Succeed Chief of Savings Rescue." A subhead, Mr. President, states "Seidman Given a Nudge."

Mr. President, for some time now, for several weeks, it has been rumored that the Bush administration is attempting to remove Mr. Seidman, who is the Chairman of the FDIC, also Chairman of the RTC, which is part of the regulatory bodies that were created last year to supervise the S&L bailout.

Let me, if I might, quote the article this morning, and I quote from the New York Times. It says:

> Administration officials have said that the White House would like Mr. Seidman, whose term expires next year, to leave.
> Despite Mr. Bush's disclaimer, his remarks today amounted to a firm shove to encourage Mr. Seidman to step down. But it was a shove that gave Mr. Seidman at least the face-saving appearance of taking the initiative to leave. Pressure from White House officials has increased steadily since Mr. Bush and Mr. Seidman met personally about two weeks ago.

Mr. President, this is the critical point; this is the critical paragraph in this particular article.

> Mr. Seidman has rankled the White House, administration officials say, by pursuing his own agenda on Capitol Hill and criticizing the Government's performance in handling the savings and loan crisis.

Mr. President, also earlier this week the New York Times had what I thought was a very splendid editorial—I think this editorial was in the Times on Wednesday. Let me quote, Mr. President, from this editorial:

> The savings and loan bailout is already a mess. Why does the Bush administration seem so determined to make the cleanup even slower? Now it is not so subtly nudging out the man who is managing the bailout.

This was in reference, Mr. President, to Mr. Seidman. The editorial goes on:

> F.B.I. Director William Sessions testified that though his agents had found pervasive fraud, that paper trail was so difficult to verify that it would take years to catch the thieves. Last year's S&L bailout legislation authorized $75 million a year for additional agents and Justice Department attorneys for three years. More than 200 have been added, but still more will be needed. Yet the Administration only sought $49 million of new enforcement funds for the first year and contends that $50 million will do for the second.

Earlier this week I know the distinguished occupant of the chair will remember a debate relative to an amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Colorado, Senator WIRTH, when he rose on the floor of the U.S. Senate, after having discovered in the Panamanian foreign aid bill a $30 million fund for "Panamanian tourism."

Senator WIRTH, in his wisdom, introduced an amendment to take that $30 million from the Panamanian tourism fund to give to the Government of the United States to help in expediting the prosecution of these people who have literally robbed the savings and loans of this country.

It is sad to say, Mr. President, that the amendment by the distinguished Senator from Colorado did not receive sufficient votes. I assume, therefore, that $30 million is now going to Panama for a tourism fund, and that our country, our Government, is $30 million less well off because we do not have the funds nor the mechanism, but most importantly the desire and the commitment to prosecute these people who have pillaged the savings and loans of this country.

Mr. President, I met on Tuesday morning in my office with about 11 savings and loan executives from my State. Perhaps the distinguished occupant of the chair met with the S&L people as they have been here for their national meeting. This may have been, by the way, their last national meeting. They may not have any more national meetings because there is nothing to meet about.

These people who were in my office, Mr. President, were not the large multibillion dollar financial institutions that have been pillaged, that have been robbed. These were small S&L's from a small rural State who have done nothing except to do what the S&L's were originally chartered to do over five decades ago—to make home loans. One of these small S&L operators told me that in the 53-year existence of his institution in a small rural area of northeast Arkansas virtually the only type of loan he has made is home loans. Community minded, public spirited individuals who today have been castigated because they operate savings and loan chartered to make home loans. They have lived by the rules.

They have lived by the charter, and today they are being wiped out. Another individual in the office that morning, from a small S&L, told me that in 1989 the special assessments, the premiums and the examination costs of this little S&L amounted to $126,000.

Mr. President, that is a lot of money for a small S&L. However, in 1990 they will be sent a bill by the U.S. Government for examination costs, premiums and special assessments, no longer for $126,000, but for $420,000.

Mr. President, these fees have almost consumed the profit of this savings and loan that is doing nothing except making home loans today. What do we have going on in Washington at the same time? We have a bureaucratic morass that has paralyzed, absolutely paralyzed the reason and the justification for these savings and loans to exist in the first place.

These savings and loan presidents and officers told me in my office that they have given up; they cannot get answers; they cannot get responses; they do not know whether it is the OTS or the RTC or FDIC, or who it is they are to answer to. One of the savings and loan presidents in this company, who has been there for almost 60 years, testified that he had gone into a participation agreement with three Texas S&L's, all of which are under RTC control—his is solvent—and they were trying to dispose of an asset which was owned equally by the four institutions. They found a buyer. They could have made a profit of $300,000. They could have taken that asset off the books; the Government would not be liable, and people would start being made whole again.

Did this S&L get the green light? Did these S&L's get the green light to dispose of this particular asset? The answer is no. For 6 months they have been trying to get an answer from the bureaucracy on whether or not they could make this sale to a qualified purchaser. There is no response. There is no answer.

Only last month, Mr. President, we had a debate on the floor of this Senate about the nomination of Tim Ryan. Mr. Ryan is a good individual, but he was not qualified to take over the job of Director of the Office of Thrift Supervision. OTS, as the Chair will remember, was the agency, that part of this bureaucratic morass that is now operating, or not operating, that was chaired by Danny Wall. Danny Wall resigned on December 4.

We debated the nomination of his successor in April. For 4 months this critical position went unfilled. There was no one running the shop. There was no one in control. There was no one to make a decision. There was no one to give an answer. There was no one to supervise. There was no one to regulate. And today we see that in the next 2 to 3 months it is estimated that the taxpayers of this country, who will be bearing the responsibility, will ultimately be asked to pay approximately $1 billion each day to begin the clean-up of the S&L mess.

Mr. President, let me ask if we all might go back once again to the Wirth amendment. Who opposed the Wirth amendment? Who defeated the Wirth amendment? Who said, let us not take $30 million from tourism in Panama and give it where we can impose some enforcement and hire some prosecutors and begin pursuing some of these crooks? Who defeated that amendment?

Mr. President, George Bush defeated that amendment. The President of the United States defeated that amendment. The President of the United States started calling people and said, "We cannot have this amendment." I want to know why. I want to know why there are not prosecutions going on. I want to know why Bill Seidman, who is known as one of the finest banking regulators in this country, has been nudged out of this position. I want to know why Bill Seidman, when he disagreed with the White House and basically said this thing is not going right, why the White House said we are going to find a successor for you, Bill. You step aside and we will make it as palatable as possible.

Mr. President, we are seeing the departure of one of the great public servants of this country in Bill Seidman. This country owes him a debt of gratitute. I only hope that someday, when he has been freed from the shackles of a White House that has censored him and has stopped him from doing what he knows must be done, he can come before a committee of the U.S. Senate, and I hope that he will have the courage and the commitment to tell the individual Senators the true story of what actually has been going on since the bailout bill was signed into law by the President of the United States in the Rose Garden.

It is estimated that there are 20,000 individuals out in our country today who have robbed and looted these S&L's, who today are walking free, who are driving Jaguars and Mercedes and living in mansions.

Mr. President, what are we doing? We are turning the other way. We are nudging out people like Bill Seidman, who has the courage to speak his mind, and we are replacing many of these individuals with fine people, yes, but people who do not have the expertise, who do not have the knowledge, and my fear, who do not have the commitment to do what we need to do.

Mr. President, I think President Bush owes this country an explanation as to what is going on, why Bill Seidman is being nudged out, and exactly what his agenda is for dealing with the largest bailout and one of the greatest fiascos in American history.

It was only 90 days ago or so, Mr. President, that Dan Kearney, who had been brought in from Boston to serve as president of the RTC, stepped down from that job. It shocked everyone. He had just gone into the position.

What reasons did he give? He said, one, he was not given a free hand. Two, he could not fill vacant positions. Three, he could get no direction whatever from the Department of the Treasury or the President of the United States as to which way he should proceed.

Mr. President, if we think this debacle has been bad, it is going to get worse. It is going to get worse, and all I can say is that I believe—and I call upon the President of the United States—that the President must come forward and explain exactly what has been going on, and tell us what to expect.

I think Mr. Darman ought to go before the committees, and I think he needs to answer this question: Mr. Darman, when you bring up our next bill in the billions and billions of dollars for further bailouts, are you going to ask that this be off budget or on budget? He seems to think that these dollars are not real dollars, that this is "funny money."

Mr. President, there are a lot of questions. The credibility is eroding by the hour. Inasmuch as I have quoted on two occasions, Mr. President, the New York Times, let me give equal treatment to the Washington Post. Let me say that tomorrow there should be a classified ad in the Washington Post, and in that ad it should read something like this:

Chief executive officer wanted for largest Government bailout in U.S. history. Over $200 billion at your disposal. Experience is a plus, but political obedience a must. It will matter not whether you win or lose but how you place the blame.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have two articles printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, May 4, 1990]

WHY SO SLOW ON S&L THIEVES?

The savings and loan bailout is already a mess. Why does the Bush Administration seem so determined to make the cleanup even slower? Now it is not so subtly nudging out the man who is managing the bailout. That comes hard on the heels of Congressional hearings showing Administration stinginess in prosecuting S & L thieves.

An argument can at least be made for retiring William Seidman, chairman of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation and of the Resolution Trust Corporation. He's a holder appointee who has said he intends to leave before his term expires next year. But there's no excuse for the insufficient prosecutorial effort.

S & L officers and owners who bled their institutions bankrupt are proving hard to catch. Most of the plunder has been squandered on bad investments and high living. That's the frustrating message from the latest of the House Banking Committee's useful hearings on the scandal.

F.B.I. Director William Sessions testified that though his agents had found "pervasive" fraud, the paper trail was so difficult to verify that it would take years to catch the thieves. Last year's S & L bailout legislation authorized $75 million a year for additional agents and Justice Department attorneys for three years. More than 200 have been added, but still more will be needed. Yet the Administration only sought $49 million of new enforcement funds for the first year and contends that $50 million will do for the second.

Fraud alone did not bring on the crisis, and could not have flourished without lax Federal regulation. Even so, the fraud was widespread and huge. Public anger at paying taxes to bail out thievery is fully justified. Moreover, unpunished fraud undermines confidence in financial institutions.

Henry Gonzales, the Texas Democrat who heads the House committee, has built a valuable record of what went wrong. The most electrifying hearings, on the Lincoln Savings and Loan case in California, spotlighted the Senate's "Keating Five," who took large campaign contributions from Lincoln's chairman, Charles Keating.

Two of the five are the Senate Banking Committee's chairman, Donald Riegle of Michigan, and its ranking Democrat, Alan Cranston of California. That may help explain why the committee hasn't picked up Mr. Gonzalez's lead. All five are under investigation by the Senate Ethics Committee.

The thrift industry's troubles turned into the biggest financial crisis in history while Congress—and the Reagan Administration—looked the other way. To keep looking away is to endorse fraud.

BUSH NAMES CHOICE TO SUCCEED CHIEF OF SAVINGS RESCUE—SEIDMAN GIVEN A NUDGE

(By Nathaniel C. Nash)

WASHINGTON, May 3.—President Bush said today that he wanted William Taylor, the Federal Reserve Board's top banking regulator, to succeed L. William Seidman as head of the Government's savings and loan bailout when Mr. Seidman steps down.

At the same time, trying to limit damage to the bailout caused by the Administration's effort to push Mr. Seidman out, the President praised Mr. Seidman's work as chairman of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation and the Resolution Trust Corporation, and made a point of noting that Mr. Seidman himself had first raised the question of his leaving.

"I haven't told you I'm anxious to see Bill Seidman leave," Mr. Bush said at a news conference. "I think Seidman has conducted himself with extraordinary grace and great ability."

TERM EXPIRES IN 1991

Mr. Bush said that Mr. Seidman had come to him "a while back" and "said he was not going to fulfill his term." Administration officials have said that the White House would like Mr. Seidman, whose term expires next year, to leave.

Despite Mr. Bush's disclaimer, his remarks today amounted to a firm shove to encourage Mr. Seidman to step down. But it was a shove that gave Mr. Seidman at least the face-saving appearance of taking the initiative to leave. Pressure from White House officials has increased steadily since Mr. Bush and Mr. Seidman met personally about two weeks ago.

TAKING AN INDEPENDENT COURSE

Mr. Seidman has rankled the White House, Administration officials say, by pursuing his own agenda on Capitol Hill and criticizing the Government's performance in handling the savings and loan crisis.

The Administration's effort to push Mr. Seidman out has drawn criticism from Democrats in Congress, who want to make the Bush Administration's handling of the bailout and its cost to the public a major election issue.

Some bankers and industry analysts have expressed concern about the effort to get Mr. Seidman to resign, warning that it could undermine the confidence of the public and investors in the bailout program, driving the cost to the taxpayer even higher. The bailout cost has been estimated at as much as $500 billion over the next three decades.

Mr. Bush said that Mr. Seidman had telephoned him this morning and had suggested that Mr. Taylor would be the best candidate to succeed him. Mr. Taylor is currently on loan from the Federal Reserve to serve as chief executive of the oversight board of the Resolution Trust Corporation.

Industry officials welcomed Mr. Bush's nod to Mr. Taylor. "He's absolutely first rate, a very strong regulator," said Kenneth A. Gunther, executive vice president of the Independent Bankers Association, a Washington-based trade group.

Members of Congress are likely to accept a Taylor nomination. "Seidman's departure will not be well received by Congress, but Taylor's appointment will be supported," said Representative Jim Leach, Republican of Iowa. "But you will have a shift from a spritely personality to a plaid one."

COMPARISON TO A WALTZ

Mr. Leach said he thought the day's events were an odd way for the President to indicate his choice of Mr. Taylor to replace Mr. Seidman. "Seidman annointed his own successor, Bush said nice things about him, but Seidman didn't resign and Bush didn't announce a definitive change," Mr. Leach said. "It's a kind of two waltz to a four-step beat."

Mr. Taylor has been praised for his work as head of bank regulation and supervision at the Federal Reserve, his initial work on forming the oversight board last fall after President Bush signed the bailout legislation into law, and then for taking over as acting chief executive of the board when Daniel P. Kearney abruptly left, in February. Mr. Kearney said privately then that the Treasury was constantly meddling in his work.

Mr. Taylor has forged a strong working relationship with the Treasury—Secretary Nicholas F. Brady is chairman of the oversight board—and with Mr. Seidman and top officials at Resolution Trust. In a sense he is performing a delicate bureaucratic dance, because during the earliest months of the bailout the Treasury and Resolution Trust were often at odds, a situation that slowed the bailout considerably.

FEARS THAT OTHERS WILL LEAVE

Industry experts and members of Congress have been concerned that an untimely departure by Mr. Seidman would cause crucial personnel he appointed to leave the trust corporation, which manages the day-to-day aspects of the bailout. A Taylor appointment, which would be seen more as based on its merits than as a political move, would be less likely to leave the agency crippled at the top, they said.

Today's comments by the President came after two days of intense speculation about the fate of Mr. Seidman, who is considered by many industry experts and members of Congress one of the most capable and independent banking regulators.

Mr. Bush cannot require Mr. Seidman to resign. The bailout law signed last summer designates him, as chairman of the F.D.I.C., as an independent regulator. The President's comments of support and his implication that he was not going to ask for an immediate departure seemed in a different tenor from recent comments by senior Administration officials, who have been saying the Administration would like to be rid of Mr. Seidman and have its own appointee in place.

The President indicated that Mr. Seidman would remain in the post at least through the end of June.

"We have a significant project that he is in the middle of handling," Mr. Bush said. "We call it the June 30th project, to get a lot more done with a lot of these savings and loans in a short period of time. And he's agreed to enthusiastically tackle that."

Mr. Seidman recently announced an ambitious plan to liquidate or sell off 141 insolvent savings and loan associations by the end of June at an initial cost to the Government of $57 billion. If successful, it would be the first clear sign that the Bush bailout plan has a chance for success.

In a telephone interview, Mr. Seidman said, "The President has asked me to pitch in and get this project done, and that is what I'll do."

Mr. Bush said he was "very high" on Mr. Taylor to take over Mr. Seidman's responsibilities when he leaves. It is likely that once Mr. Seidman gives the signal that he is ready to depart, Mr. Taylor will quickly be nominated.

An assistant to Mr. Taylor said that Mr. Taylor would not comment on the President's remarks today.

It is considered unlikely that Mr. Taylor would turn down the job of directing the overall bailout.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBB). Without objection, it is so ordered.

NEW CONCERNS ABOUT JAPANESE PLUTONIUM PACT

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, two years ago—almost to the month—the Senate rejected an effort to disapprove a new nuclear cooperation agreement with Japan. Under that agreement, which will be in effect until 2018, the United States will stop performing case-by-case reviews of what Japan does with the weapon-usuable nuclear material produced in the uranium we sell to Japan. As a result of this agreement, Congress and the American people will no longer have the opportunity to read of such activities in the Federal Register.

I opposed that agreement, along with 29 of my Senate colleagues; serious criticisms were also heard from the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, the Department of Defense, the General Accounting Office, most of the members of the Senate Foreign Relations and House Foreign Affairs Committees, and a variety of public interest and environmental groups. The current Vice President of the United States was among the 29 who finally voted against it on March 21, 1988.

That is a very formidable lineup of people who questioned what was being done in this agreement.

I wish to speak today, however, not about the specific terms of this 30-year nuclear accord. The reasons for strong bipartisan opposition to that agreement both on and off the Hill had nothing to do with Japan, but a lot to do with standards governing foreign uses of plutonium produced for United States origin fuel or in United States supplied nuclear reactors. These arguments have already been throughly stated in the RECORD; and many if not most of those reasons continue to be valid. [CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, September 16, 1988, S12763-S12768; March 21, 1988, S2625-S2677; March 3, 1988, S1919; February 4, 1988, S625-S627; and February 2, 1988, S452-S458].

A FLAWED PROCESS OF CONSULTATION AND REVIEW

I rise today, however, not to discuss the substance of that ill-advised agreement, but a new problem that has just come to light concerning the process by which it was negotiated and approved. It is a flawed process of consultation and review.

Successful policies aimed both at nuclear nonproliferation and nuclear cooperation depend heavily upon the level of mutual respect and confidence that exists between the Congress and the executive branch, and upon a healthy recognition that sound policies rely heavily on contributions from diverse Federal agencies that do not always share the same point of view on all issues. These avenues of Federal and interagency conflict are part of our system of government. Such forms of conflict serve to guarantee a full testing of policies both before they are prepared and throughout their implementation. The Soviet Union and nations in Eastern Europe have witnessed the positive value from such democratic processes and are now in the process of copying them because they produce better results.

The process by which the Japan nuclear agrement was negotiated and approved, however, stands as a shining model of what should be avoided. Not only did the Reagan administration fail to consult regularly with Congress during the long period of secret negotiations which led to the agreement; by the time these negotiations were finalized, both the NRC and Defense Department were complaining about having been excluded from the process of reviewing this agreement—some of the very places in government that it should be considered in-depth. Clearly, there was something profoundly wrong with the process by which this agreement was negotiated and approved.

I remember once asking former Assistant Secretary of Defense Richard Perle at a Goverment Affairs Committee hearing on March 5, 1989, to describe the role of the Defense Department in reviewing that agreement. He answered accordingly:

> We crashed the party, Senator, on a number of occasions. * * * We invited ourselves to meetings. We made a general nuisance of ourselves in memoranda and other ways, and ultimately I believe we were successful in obtaining an arrangement.

The Chairman of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, Lando Zech, similarly wrote to Ambassador Richard Kennedy at the State Department on July 27, 1987, that "The Commission is concerned about its exclusion from essentially all aspects of the negotiations on this agreement." I might add the full text of this letter can be found in the RECORD, February 2, 1988, p. S457.

Evidently not everybody had such problems gaining access to information about the status of the negotiations surrounding this agreement. According to a recent article in the Wall Street Journal, a firm with substantial ties to Japanese nuclear companies evidently participated closely in the governmental processes of preparing, reviewing, and approving this agreement. The company, identified as International Energy Associates Ltd., [IEAL]—now owned by ERC International, was reportedly advising the Department of Energy on political, security, and environmental aspects of the new United States-Japan Nuclear Agreement of Cooperation. For all we know, the firm may now also be helping to implement that agreement.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at the end of my remarks today the text of an article by John Fialka entitled, "Consultant Doubled as Adviser to Japanese Firms And to the U.S., Playing Its Dual Roles with Ease," March 27, 1990, p. A22 of the Wall Street Journal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. GLENN. The article specifically claims that this firm was analyzing secret portions of the draft nuclear agreement, writing answers to congressional objections to the agreement—including many of my own, no doubt—preparing briefing papers for the incoming Bush administration on the agreement, and even writing the Department of Energy's user's manual for the agreement—all of these activities, while also consulting for a group of Japanese nuclear utilities.

ILLUSTRATION OF POLITICAL CONSULTING

Since publication of this article, my committee staff has unearthed a political assessment prepared by this firm for its corporate clients in Japan on December 2, 1986, addressing the effects of the 1986 congressional elections on future legislative politics in the field of nuclear nonproliferation. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at the end of my remarks today the full text of this document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GLENN. I am revealing this document today so that members of the public can make up their own minds about the propriety of the curious triangular relationship that has evidently existed—and may continue to exist—between various offices of the executive branch, IEAL, and a group of nuclear companies in Japan.

The document offers some interesting insights into the legislative process, I must say, especially with respect to nuclear nonproliferation issues. Here is what the report had to say about Senator CRANSTON and myself:

Senators Glenn and Cranston, the two senators most active on nonproliferation matters * * * can be expected to take very cool positions towards reprocessing, plutonium use and long-term approvals of such activities, among other nuclear issues, and both can sway votes. * * * Because each member can specialize in only a few issues, he/she often turns to perceived "experts" on other issues for guidance in voting; Glenn and Cranston enjoy the status of being regarded as experts * * *. Senator Glenn, of course, has made nonproliferation, IAEA safeguards, etc. some of his pet topics with the active assistance of his staff adviser Leonard Weiss. He also has expressed reservations—albeit in a much milder form [than Cranston]—to long-term programmatic approvals [for plutonium use]. As we shall note shortly we expect his influence to be increased as well in the new Senate.

The study then turned to a searching review of likely sources of opposition to the new nuclear agreement; the memo reads like a war plan, complete with a roster of potential enemies and allies:

While an agreement for cooperation would not be referred to his Committee. . . . Glenn could use his [own] committee's oversight of interagency procedures, etc., to monitor, for example whether the Pentagon (which has been "hardline" on plutonium related issues) really is able to influence policy in directions Glenn favors. As is well known, Senator Glenn's staff aide for nonproliferation, Len Weiss, (to whom we already have referred) is a long-standing hard-liner, will become Glenn's Committee staff director and has indicated that Glenn will give nonproliferation high priority next year. Weiss is almost chronically critical of the nonproliferation policy of the Executive Branch and we would expect him to remain in this mode.

The other House hard-liners, such as Cong. Wolpe, and Markey, are coming back. Cong. Gephardt will join them. Gephardt has gone on record as strongly opposed to greater plutonium use and he made a particularly strong speech to this effect at Paul Leventhal's symposium on Nuclear Terrorism that was held in Washington last year.

The report then cautioned that:

The Administration may have to spend a great deal of political capital to achieve its objectives in this area [Japan agreement, PRC nuclear agreement, and Pakistan aid renewal], and even more to avoid the imposition of any additional legislative constraints in the nonproliferation area. This would be difficult enough in a divided Congress; it will be even more so in a Democrat-controlled legislative branch.

Later, the focus shifted back to a more detailed search for sources of likely legislative and interagency opposition to the Japanese nuclear agreement:

At this juncture we anticipate that the nonproliferation/anti-nuclear hard-liners will again try to grab the initiative and that behind the scenes they will be reinforced in their efforts by anti-State Department elements in the Pentagon. . . . It is quite possible that the nonproliferation office at the Pentagon, given its anti-reprocessing, anti-plutonium views, may confront the other Executive Branch agencies and object to the programmatic approval provision as well as the physical protection aspects of the Agreement. . . . If DOD is unsuccessful at this level, the DoD staffers may well turn to their Congressional allies behind the scenes for support. If the balance of the Executive Branch supports the Agreement with Japan as it most certainly will, this will raise the issue of whether the White House working with State Department will be able to successfully discipline the Pentagon to avoid subverting the Administration's policy.

The Nuclear Regulatory Commission was not spared in this assessment:

As we have noted in other reports, the NRC has often been insatiable in its requests for information regarding the adequacy of safeguards applied to sensitive materials and activities. * * * While the NRC is going through a reorganization, we have no reason to believe this will serve to moderate its lust to ask more questions than the executive branch is prepared or able to answer.

Mr. President, I would like to remind my colleagues that the paragraphs above were written by a firm that was simultaneously working for both the U.S. Federal Government and the Japanese nuclear interests.

In December 1987, I testified before the Foreign Relations Committee and called the Japan nuclear agreement perhaps the most significant nuclear cooperation agreement in history. I made that statement because of provisions substantially relaxing standards, not tightening them, relaxing standards covering the use of tons of plutonium under that agreement. Not a few pounds, not a research reactor output, but tons of plutonium.

Now we are hearing that foreign and domestic commercial interests may have had a hand not only in negotiating the agreement but in selling it on Capitol Hill with tactics that included at least one direct approach to a House committee and now realize that my words back in 1987 may turn out to be something of an understatement.

When the United States enters into agreements with other nations covering future uses of U.S.-origin bomb-grade nuclear materials, the American people have a right to expect that such agreements will be concluded to serve the national security interests of the United States, not the corporate interests of business enterprises, both at home and abroad, that stand to benefit from such agreements.

In light of these recent revelations, Congress will clearly have to take a much closer look, not just at this particular agreement, but at the whole process by which such agreements are negotiated and presented to Congress for review.

My colleague, Senator PRYOR, who chairs the Governmental Affairs Subcommittee on Federal Services, has already identified a wide variety of conflict of interest problems involving Government contractors.

In a report by his subcommittee issued last November, the following conclusions were reached about the Energy Department's use of private contractors:

DOE relies on a private workforce to perform virtually all basic government functions. It relies on contractors in the preparation of its most important plans and policies, the development of budgets and budget documents, and the drafting of reports to Congress and Congressional testimony. It relies on contractors to monitor arms control negotiations, help prepare decisions on the export of nuclear technology, and conduct hearings and initial appeals in challenges to security clearance disputes. In addition, a contractor workforce is relied on by the Inspector General.

In chilling words, the report observed: "As Federal officials come and go, often to leave for more rewarding work in contractor organizations, DOE's official memory is fast becoming, and may already be, a corporate memory."

For a full text of this report, see the U.S. Senate, Committee on Governmental Affairs, Subcommittee on Federal Services, Post Office, and Civil Service hearing on "Use of Consultants and Contractors by the Environmental Protection Agency and the Department of Energy," 101st Congress, first session, November 6, 1989.

Mr. President, the Japan agreement provides yet another example of how some essential Government services are evidently being delegated by the agencies to the private sector, in this case, to a firm with foreign clients having significant economic interests at stake and specific policy outcomes.

We all have heard or talked about Japan, Inc. around here. It seems we may well be on our way to a USA, Inc. When the business is plutonium, this is all the more disturbing and unacceptable.

Mr. President, the allegations in this article call for a closer examination of this firm's activities concerning the Japan nuclear agreement. I have asked my staff on the Governmental Affairs Committee to investigate these recent claims and to report their findings and recommendations to me as soon as possible.

I will ask the Department of Energy what steps it has taken to detect and prevent such potential conflicts of interest and to explain why these steps evidently did not work in this particular instance.

In subsequent weeks, I plan to address in statements on this floor other aspects of this nuclear agreement and, in particular, the arrangements that are contemplated for transporting plutonium from Europe back to Japan. I will also provide any further details that may become available without the possible conflict of interest in this particular agreement.

Finally, I look forward to working closely with Senator PRYOR and his staff to improve Congress' ability to oversee all Government contracting to ensure against such conflicts of interest in the future.

I yield the floor.

CONSULTANT DOUBLED AS ADVISER TO JAPANESE FIRMS AND TO THE UNITED STATES, PLAYING ITS DUAL ROLES WITH EASE

(By John J. Fialka)

WASHINGTON.—In the waning summer heat of August 1987, the U.S. Department of Energy grappled with a hot political question: What would happen if a Japan-bound plane full of plutonium crashed in Alaska?

President Reagan needed an environmental assessment quickly, and the job went to International Energy Associates Ltd., or IEAL, a Fairfax, Va., consulting firm. But before the U.S. government made its decision on the environmental problem, a group of Japanese utility executives knew how it would come out.

How did the Japanese get the jump? Simple: They, too, had hired IEAL to provide confidential reports on a pending U.S.-Japan agreement worth billions to Japanese utilities using nuclear fuel, which was under attack in Congress. In a report to the Japanese stamped "Proprietary," IEAL predicted—accurately, as it turned out—that the U.S. government would not find major environmental hazards.

As global economic relations grow closer, the consultants that help shape U.S. policy are in greater demand than ever. A stack of proprietary reports for IEAL's clients, obtained by The Wall Street Journal, show how easily such consulting firms can play both sides of an issue.

Asked to examine the reports, Sen. David Pryor (D., Ark.), whose Senate Government Affairs subcommittee has been probing the federal government's growing reliance on outside consultants, called IEAL's duel roles a "brazen conflict" and a "a classic example of working both sides of the street."

The company says it has done what is required of it. IEAL, which has since changed its name to Environmental & Energy Services Co., or ERC, maintains it has fully complied with federal law, which requires contractors to divulge potential conflicts.

Although it isn't mentioned in the public record of players in the fight over the U.S. agreement to give Japan a blanket 30-year approval to use U.S.-safeguarded nuclear fuel, IEAL left its cleat marks all over the field. Starting in September 1986, it was hired by DOE to analyze secret portions of the agreement, to write answers to objections from critics in Congress and to prepare briefing papers on the issues for the incoming Bush administration. It even wrote the DOE "users manual" for the agreement after it was approved by Congress in 1988.

Throughout the whole process, IEAL worked under a separate contract to keep the prime beneficiaries of the deal—the Japanese utility executives—ahead of the game.

The consulting firm's undisclosed two-hatted role, Sen. Pryor says, may have "tainted" Congress's whole understanding of the agreement with Japan. In a letter to President Bush last week, the senator said "the question is the integrity of one of our most basic governmental processes, the duties of the executive and legislative branches in regards to debating and approving international agreements."

"I was unaware of it," says Peter Brush, an acting assistant secretary at DOE who promoted the IEAL contract, referring to IEAL's regular newsletter reports to Japan. "Had I known about this newsletter, I probably would have taken it down to our procurement people." DOE'S procurement office has told Sen. Pryor that the IEAL contract is one of a number under investigation, where the agency "had not been diligent" in looking for conflicts of interest.

In reply, company Vice President Harold D. Bengelsdorf says: "They [DOE] knew we were writing newsletters and I think they knew we were working for the utilities." Mr. Bengelsdorf says his office worked on both the DOE accounts and the confidential reports. During an interview, Mr. Bengelsdorf, a former State Department official, repeatedly asserted that IEAL didn't help shape the U.S. policy, but merely provided "technological input."

IEAL's own documents, however, present a much less modest view of its activities. One newsletter tells how Mr. Bengelsdorf and another IEAL contributor to the newsletter, Charles Van Doren, made a "direct approach" to a House committee staff member in an attempt to head off a General Accounting Office report that questioned the legality of the Japanese plutonium deal.

In a letter to DOE requesting an additional profit margin for its $178,000 of consulting work, IEAL argued that it had worked on the "most sensitive and controversial aspects of the agreement." DOE turned down the request.

Plutonium is a silvery-gray metal that is created from uranium atoms as they are fissioned or "split" in nuclear reactors. It must be carefully safeguarded because it is used in nuclear weapons. It can also be used as a substitute for the uranium fuel that is used in nuclear power plants, and Japanese utilities have invested billions of yen in plans to recycle the plutonium created in their nuclear reactors.

Their problem is that U.S. safeguards still apply to much of their plutonium because it was created from uranium purchased from the U.S. During the early 1980s, U.S. permission to use the plutonium came only after a slow, case-by-case process. The Japanese wanted something faster. Tons of spent uranium fuel from Japan were stacking up in France, which has a plant that separates the plutonium from nuclear waste.

The U.S. State Department proposed that Japan be allowed regular flights of plutonium from France to Japan, using a polar route over Alaska. The Defense Department and environmental groups sharply disagreed, questioning the legality and the safety of extending blanket authority to the Japanese to move the plutonium.

For the Japanese most concerned, the utilities executives, the narrator of this complex dispute was IEAL, which also sent separate reports to Japan's Power Reactor and Nuclear Fuel Development Corp., a quasi-governmental agency that is preparing Japan's own plutonium-separation facilities.

In their reports, IEAL took aim at foes of the pending deal. "Anti-plutonium hardliners" ranged from the current majority leader of the House, Rep. Richard Gephardt (D., Mo.), to Gerald G. Oplinger, then head of the Pentagon unit studying the U.S.-Japan agreement.

And there are unidentified "responsible administration officials" who gave IEAL advance tips on U.S. policy, nearly all of which turned out to be correct. While there is much well-informed discussion about secret documents in the reports. Mr. Oplinger, who has studied them, says he doubts whether it can be proven that IEAL broke any secrecy laws. A lot of information about the plutonium fight had been leaked elsewhere, he notes.

Still, he believes IEAL's activities were "highly improper." "In effect they were being paid to eavesdrop on internal workings and then to report them to a third party," says Mr. Oplinger, who has since retired from government.

There is much fulmination in the IEAL reports against Paul Leventhal, the head of the private Nuclear Control Institute in Washington, who raised the environmental objections against the plutonium agreement. Mr. Leventhal says the most disturbing apsect to him is that IEAL appears to have been shaping U.S. policy documents and strategy without registering as a foreign agent or as lobbyists. "Imagine," he says, "how the Japanese government would react if American interests sought to do the same thing in Japan."

Asked about this, Mr. Bengelsdorf says his firm received legal advice that it didn't have to register, either as a lobbyist or as a foreign agent. It provided its expertise as a "resource" for the federal government and gave advice to the Japanese, he says, without trading on inside information gained through the DOE contracts.

"It's something of a bum rap to be tagged with some kind of demonic image that we're kind of in there permeating and promoting," asserts Mr. Bengelsdorf. He says he believes that, overall, IEAL's expertise "served the public interest."

CONGRESSIONAL ELECTION RESULTS

As has been widely reported, the most important outcome of the U.S. 1986 general election was the Democrats assumption of control of the Senate. The Democrats recaptured control of the Senate with a 55-45 margin as compared to the 99th Congress when the Republicans controlled the Senate by a 53-47 margin. In the House, although the Democratic gains were minimal, the Democrats retained solid control with a 258 to 175 margin compared to the 1985 Democratic margin of 253 to 180. As a consequence, President Reagan will no longer be able to count on the support of the Senate to hold the House in check. This result could have important implications for the Reagan administration's ability to implement its nonproliferation policy. More recently, the furor in Washington over the covert links of the Reagan administration with Iran and the "resignations" and scandals that have since ensued are likely to further cloud and poison the relationships between Congress and the Executive Branch to the detriment of cooperation in several foreign policy areas—including nonproliferation.

The next several months will likely see some Congressional debate over a number of nuclear nonproliferation policy issues. First and foremost among these will be the proposed new U.S.-Japan Agreement for Cooperation which hopefully will reach Congress in late January or February. The overall complexity of this Agreement, including the provisions calling for long-term U.S. programmatic approvals for return of separated plutonium to Japan from France and the UK and for reprocessing (and as a consequence, plutonium use in Japan) can be expected to spark a Congressional debate of considerable magnitude. Some specific observations on the likely Congressional reaction are discussed later in this report.

Another prominent issue will be the implementation of the U.S.-China Agreement for Cooperation. The Administration plans to submit for Congressional review the administrative arrangements for implementing Article 8 of the U.S.-China Agreement, which relates to measures to provide assurance of peaceful use of U.S.-origin materials, equipment, and technology exported to China.

As may be recalled, a number of Democratic Senators found the Agreement with PNC itself objectionable because it lacked a requirement that IAEA safeguards be applied to the activities in the PRC that would be assisted pursuant to the Agreement. (As matters had evolved, the PRC had accepted such a condition in bilateral agreements, with some other supplier countries but not with the U.S.) It is quite possible therefore, that these past opponents of the Agreement will challenge as unsatisfactory whatever formulation the Administration now submits relating to the administrative arrangements.

Another controversial item on the congressional agenda will be the need to renew for another six years the waiver for Pakistan of Section 669 of the Foreign Assistance Act, which otherwise would prohibit U.S. security assistance to Pakistan because that country imported uranium enrichment technology outside of safeguards. Since this waiver must be renewed by September 30, 1987, it too will be an early test of the Congressional reaction to Administration's foreign policy positions in the nonproliferation area.

In addition to these three major issues, there are a number of separate issues that could also cause friction between Congress and the Executive Branch. These include:

Possible further legislative proposals growing out of the responses by the Department of Defense and other Agencies with respect to the adequacy of physical protection of separated plutonium and HEU and the role of DOD with respect to decisions relating thereto;

Implementation of the South Africa uranium import embargo;

Issues related to the export of U.S. nuclear technologies including those related to "sensitive nuclear technology" and the implementation of the amended 10 CFR Part 810 regulations which should be issued shortly;

Further retransfers of U.S.-origin plutonium separated at La Hague back to Switzerland for use in a recycle demonstration program;

The sufficiency of IAEA safeguards.

It seems likely that the after effects of Chernobyl as it affects perceptions of nuclear safety also will be the subject of further hearings, but we would not expect the safety area to be as adversarial between Congress and the Executive Branch as issues in the field of nonproliferation.

Changes in the composition of Congress resulting from the election are likely to affect (1) the relative vigor of Congressional oversight of these and possible other nuclear export policy issues, and (2) the prospects for new legislative initiatives relating to nonproliferation. The disarray in Washington as a result of the "Iranian connection" most likely will materially add to the Congressional mistrust of the Administration and this too could add to the intensity of the debate over nonproliferation issues. On the other hand, moderates in the Congress will be anxious to do what they can to help heal the wounds and embarrassment that the U.S. has suffered over Iran, and this may encourage them to be very selective and cautious as to which issues in the area of foreign affairs they wish to use to force a "showdown" with the Administration.

While it is still too early to speak definitively about reshuffling of Committee assignments and staff members (the Democrats began making their assignments on November 20, the House Democrats on December 8), there is set forth below a preliminary analysis of the potential impact of the election results on members of Congress who have been active on nonproliferation issues, and on the principal committees and subcommittees involved.

A relatively small number of Senators and Representatives (in most cases Democrats) have been primarily responsibile for Congressional activities in recent years relating to nuclear nonproliferation. Thus, the extent to which the November, 1986 elections will have a major impact on Congressional nonproliferation activities will depend largely upon: Which of these activists will remain in the new Congress; what changes take place in the relevant Committees and their leadership; and whether any newly elected members of Congress will choose nonproliferation and civil nuclear cooperation as one of their major interests.

While no predictions on this matter can be made with absolute certainty, the following analysis attempts to describe significant possibilities to watch for.

Senate: Senators Glenn and Cranston, the two senators most active on nonproliferation matters, both stood for re-election in 1986, and both won. Both can be expected to take very cool positions towards reprocessing, plutonium use and long-term approvals of such activities, among other nuclear issues, and both can sway votes. (Because each Member can specialize in only a few issues, he/she often turns to perceived "experts" on other issues for guidance in voting; Glenn and Cranston enjoy the status of being regarded as experts.) Cranston has been particularly hostile to the Reagan Administration and he has been re-elected despite some personal intense efforts on the part of the President himself to unseat him. His special staff assistant for dealing with nonproliferation matters has been Gerry Warburg who is widely viewed within the Executive Branch as an extremely difficult person to deal with on nonproliferation matters. Cranston was one of those Senators who raised objections to the U.S. Agreement with China and he was one of the members in Congress who tried unsuccessfully in the courts to block long-term U.S. approvals of spent fuel retransfers for reprocessing. We can only assume he will present difficulties when the U.S.-Japan Agreement reaches Congress.

Senator Glenn, of course, has made nonproliferation, IAEA safeguards, etc. some of his pet topics with the active assistance of his staff adviser Leonard Weiss. He also has expressed reservations—albeit in a much milder form—to long-term programmatic approvals. As we shall note shortly we expect his influence to be increased as well in the new Senate.

Of the other Senators who have played significant roles on nonproliferation questions, the terms of Senators Proxmire, Lugar, Cochran, Roth, Cohen, Pell and Kennedy, and of Senator McClure (the strongest pro-nuclear Senator) will continue for at least two more years.

Because the November, 1986 elections resulted in a Senate that has a majority of Democratic members, the resulting changes at the Committee level could have considerable impact. The Chairmanship of the Committees and subcommittees in the Senate Foreign Relations and Senate Governmental Affairs Committee will go to a Democrat, and the Republican Senators who would otherwise have been Chairmen thereof will become ranking minority members.

The ratio of Democratic/Republican members on each committee and subcommittee will also be changed to reflect the Democratic majority. It is being predicted that for most Senate Committees, the Democratic/Republican ratio will simply be reversed from the present composition. For example, in the 99th Congress Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Republicans had nine seats while the Democrats had eight, and on the Governmental Affairs Committee, Republicans had seven seats and the Democrats had six. If the prediction holds true and the total number of seats on the Committee remain the same, then the Democrats would have nine seats on the Foreign Relations (Republicans eight) and seven seats on the Governmental Affairs Committee (Republicans six). Committee staffs, likewise, will be shuffled. This obviously means that the Democratic staff members will have more say and greater influence on the priorities and direction of the Committee's activities. (A list of the Senate committees and the vacancies that will need to be filled as a result of the election, and the particular Democratic Senators most likely to assume these chairmanships, if based on seniority is being provided.)

In addition to the changes in Committee chairmanships, party ratios on the committees, committee staff changes, there are some other less obvious changes that will occur in the Senate under Democratic leadership. For example, the Democrats will now be responsible for setting the legislative agenda and dictating which issues take priority particularly as both parties prepare for the 1988 Presidential election. In addition, Democratic Committee chairmen can be expected to exercise increased use of their investigative and oversight powers, and it is quite possible that any Senate confirmation proceedings for Administration appointees to senior positions will become more controversial.

In the Senate, there will be eleven new Democratic Senators and two new Republican Senators. Although it cannot be predicted with any certainty whether any of these "freshman" Senators will take an active interest in nonproliferation, it is important to note that the outcome of a few key elections was affected by the candidates' position on nuclear issues.

Within the Senate, Senator Pell will become the Chairman of Senate Foreign Relations (SFRC). Years ago Pell served in the U.S. foreign service and he tends to be moderate in his views. However, Pell is not an energetic leader and likely will not be a strong force in his own right. What may well happen is that the Subcommittee Chairmen could exert considerable power. It also would be significant if the Arms Control Subcommittee is reconstituted (the ongoing Committee Chairman—Senator Lugar—abolished it), as that Subcommittee most likely would have oversight over nonproliferation and Agreements for Cooperation. Senator Cranston, who previously chaired the Subcommittee, might seek that chairmanship again. If the scenario does, in fact, materialize, the significance for the U.S.-Japan Agreement could be significant. In addition, Senator Harkin of Iowa will likely seek one of the additional Committee assignments the Democrats gain by virtue of being the majority party. Harkin is a strong critic of the President's foreign policy, and might well ally with Cranston. These tendencies can now be expected to intensify as a result of the recent Iranian affair.

However, in gauging the impact of the election on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, it has to be acknowledged that under Senator Lugar the Committee was not especially benign towards the Administration on nonproliferation matters. It also has to be noted that the Committee was not particularly active in the nuclear area. The senior majority staff (all Republicans) were not strong supporters of the Administration policy, nor were they particularly well included towards Ambassador Kennedy, the Administration's lead nonproliferation official, and indeed several worked in favor of tough nonproliferation provisions in the Diplomatic Security Act that was opposed in the Administration. Thus, while things undoubtedly will be significantly tougher under the Democrats, it would be incorrect to assume that had the Republicans retained control the Administration would have had an easy time on nonproliferation.

The second major change in the Senate likely to affect nonproliferation policy is that Senator Glenn will become chairman of the nuclear affairs subcommittee in the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee, as well as Chairman of the overall Committee. This gives him control of a forum for holding hearings on Administration nonproliferation policy. While an agreement for cooperation would not be referred to his Committee, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and House Foreign Affairs Committee have jurisdiction for such reviews, Glenn could use his committee's oversight of interagency procedures, etc., to monitor, for example, whether the Pentagon (which has been "hardline" on plutonium related issues) really is able to influence policy in directions Glenn favors. As is well known, Senator Glenn's staff aide for nonproliferation, Len Weiss, (to whom we already have referred) is a long-standing hard-liner, will become Glenn's Committee staff director and has indicated that Glenn will give nonproliferation high priority next year. Weiss is almost chronically critical of the nonproliferation policy of the Executive Branch and we would expect him to remain in this mode. There has been speculation that he and Glenn are considering some legislative proposals to further tighten U.S. nonproliferation policies and that this could include formulations directed against the granting of long-term U.S. approvals of reprocessing and retransfers. If such fears materialize, the implications for Japan obviously could be serious. It is still too early to tell what is likely to occur.

While much attention has focused on the changes at the Committee level, one obviously should not overlook the impact of so many more Democrats on votes, such as floor amendments, which come before the full Senate. Where Republicans with no particular political or constituent interest in nonproliferation matters would, in most cases follow the Administration's guidance (if available) on floor votes concerning such issues, many Democrats may naturally be inclined to vote against the Reagan Administration—especially now, given the Iranian situation.

In summary, the Republican control of the Senate did not assure the Administration of an easy time on nonproliferation issues. However, the Democrats will now control the Senate's agenda, call the hearings, hire the majority staff, and in general be in a stronger position to make things difficult. Moreover, their incentive to politicize issues will grow as the 1988 Presidential election draws nearer.

House: In a similar vein, we can look at the impact of the election in the House in terms of (1) the continuance in office of those members of the House who have been most active in nonproliferation matters; and (2) the House leadership and the chairmanship and composition of the relevant committees and subcommittees.

Several hard-liners will not be back. Most notable among these are Congressmen Barnes and Weaver, both of whom lost primary races for their party's nomination in their state's Senate races. They cannot run for the Congress again until 1988. Barnes was a force behind the Diplomatic Security Act, and one of the more active supporters of the other House hard-liners.

The other House hard-liners, such as Cong. Wolpe, and Markey, are coming back. Cong. Gephardt will join them. Gephardt has gone on record as strongly opposed to greater plutonium use and he made a particularly strong speech to this effect at Paul Leventhal's symposium on Nuclear Terrorism that was held in Washington last year. He also might well seek the Democratic nomination for the 1988 presidential election. Thus, he'll likely attack Reagan on every front possible and this could include on the new Japanese Agreement when that accord surfaces.

Individuals like Markey and Wolpe can be expected to be hostile to the Administration's policies in the non-proliferation and nuclear cooperation areas. It is not clear, however, at this juncture as to how many other House members will join these individuals on these issues—bearing in mind that many in Congress view this to be a fairly arcane and specialized field.

No major changes in Committee or Sub-Committee chairmanships are expected, with the possible exception that Markey might leave his subcommittee chairmanship in the House Energy and Commerce Committee. While this would likely be a positive development for the nuclear industry in general since Markey would no longer be in a position to block or muddle certain pieces of nuclear legislation, it is not at all likely that he will completely forget about nuclear issues. Because the Democrats retained control, other changes in Committee chairmanships would occur only if the reelected incumbent wanted to change assignments.

Issues: As noted earlier in this report, what is of key importance is that, unlike previous years, the nonproliferation agenda of the Congress in 1987 will be both more active and the Republicans will no longer control the Senate.

There are three major actions that presumably must be completed next year, all within a relatively compressed time frame: completion of negotiation and review of the U.S.-Japan Agreement for Cooperation, the implementation of the U.S.-China Agreement, and the waiver for Pakistan. Each is controversial in its right; together they could serve to focus Congressional attention on nonproliferation with an intensity not seen in recent years. A strong vote against the President on any of them could pose considerable difficulties for the Administration. Accordingly, the Administration may have to spend a great deal of political capital to achieve its objectives in this area, and even more to avoid the imposition of any additional legislative constraints in the nonproliferation area. This would be difficult enough in a divided Congress; it will be even more so in a Democrat-controlled legislative branch.

There are thus several danger signals now on the horizon. In addition to a more difficult Congress to deal with, there is also the Department of Defense. As discussed in previous reports to the Special Action Group, the "hard-liners" in the Congress have had two recent successes in the form of the legislation enhancing DOD's role: first with the provisions in the "Omnibus Diplomatic Security and Antiterrorist Act" enhancing DOD's role in the review of the adequacy of physical security arrangements for transfers of HEU and plutonium; and secondly, with provisions in the Defense Authorization bill according DOD fuller access to sensitive nonproliferation information possessed by the Departments of State and Energy, and requiring that agency to keep the relevant congressional committees fully and correctly informed.

DOD shows every sign of being ready to engage the State Department, and will have some Congressional allies, like Senator Glenn, in key positions of influence. Cong. Wolpe has already signalled his intent to reintroduce his legislation to close so-called "loopholes" in the NNPA, namely to require full-scope safeguards as precondition for exports of equipment components and Part 810 approvals. In view of the pendency of the U.S.-Japan Agreement, it would not surprise us if someone proposed legislation amending Section 131b of the Atomic Energy Act to require case-by-case reviews of subsequent arrangements and to try to outlaw or severely restrain long-term programmatic approvals of reprocessing and plutonium retransfers. If such a proposal surfaces, it could place elements of the Congress in direct, stark opposition to all of the efforts the U.S. and Japan have had underway these many months to place their relationship on a sounder, more harmonious footing through renegotiating of the U.S.-Japanese Agreement for Cooperation.

More broadly, the current serious controversy in Washington resulting from the recent revelation of a White House-run program of selling arms to Iran undoubtedly has seriously damaged the President's credibility. At the very least, one can expect the Democrats to attack every foreign policy point where they perceive the President to be on weak ground. It strikes us as highly improbable that the Administration's nonproliferation policy will escape this assault.

When the Senate was in Republican hands, the Administration could rely on its help in preventing such adverse developments for the President. Now the hardliners are in a stronger position, and State Department officials are worried about being able to escape moves toward further legislation or more adversarial Congressional hearings.

Hopefully, in the ultimate analysis, moderate views will prevail especially on issues that are directly associated with Japan, whose strong non-proliferation credentials are held in high regard. However, at this juncture we anticipate that the non-proliferation/anti-nuclear hard-liners will again try to grab the initiative and that behind the scenes they will be reinforced in their efforts by anti-State Department elements in the Pentagon.

Thus, as the most significant action to date in the implementation of the Administration's foreign reprocessing and plutonium use policy of 1982, once the new U.S.-Japan Agreement for Cooperation is initialled, it will have to clear several hurdles in the U.S. system before it can be brought into force. One of the first hurdles will be the interagency review which must take place before the Agreement is submitted to the President for his approval. It is quite possible that the nonproliferation office at the Pentagon, given its anti-reprocessing, anti-plutonium views, may confront the other Executive Branch agencies and object to the programmatic approval provision as well as the physical protection aspects of the Agreement. Indeed, as of this writing the final step in the completion of the negotiations with Japan is being delayed due to the Pentagon. The DOD reportedly is trying to have the annex covering the physical security of plutonium in transit interpreted in a way to accord the U.S. a case-by-case right to approve the transportation plans. There are fears that this could defeat the essence of the long-term approval process. If DOD is unsuccessful at this level, the DOD staffers may well turn to their Congressional allies behind the scenes for support. If the balance of the Executive Branch supports the Agreement with Japan as it most certainly will, this will raise the issue of whether the White House working with State Department will be able to successfully discipline the Pentagon to avoid subverting the Administration's policy.

It is also possible, though not imminent, that the NRC may have some questions, if not adverse reactions, to the proposed Agreement. As we have noted in other reports, the NRC has often been insatiable in its requests for information regarding the adequacy of safeguards applied to sensitive materials and activities. It is also worth recalling that Commissioner Asselstine took exception to the limited programmatic approvals contained in the U.S. Agreements with Sweden and Norway, and he may try to intervene or at a minimum provide dissenting views in this case. While the NRC is going through a reorganization, we have no reason to believe this will serve to moderate its lust to ask more questions than the Executive Branch is prepared or able to answer. (It should be noted that in the past—and when considering proposals for reprocessing at Tokai-Mura—NRC has raised basic questions as to whether larger commercial scale reprocessing plants could be effectively safeguarded in light of the current state of safeguards technology.) They therefore can be expected to look hard at the detailed safeguards understandings in the proposed agreement package with Japan dealing with procedures for approving reprocessing at Japan's commercial scale plant.

When the Agreement is ready for Congressional review, (i.e., the interagency review is completed, the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency has completed its nonproliferation assessment of the Agreement, and the President has approved it) it will be subject to the new procedures for Congressional review set forth in the Export Administration Amendments Act of 1985. Briefly, under these new procedures a distinction is made between Agreements that satisfy the criteria in Section 123 of the Atomic Energy Act and those that the President submits with an exemption from one or more of the criteria. In the former case, (which we expect will apply to the new U.S.-Japan Agreement) the Agreement will enter into force after a Congressional review period of 90 days has elapsed, unless during that period Congress enacts a joint resolution disapproving the Agreement. Where an exemption is involved, however, the Agreement cannot enter into force unless Congress specifically approves the Agreement by enactment of a joint resolution. Under the latter option, the Congress could preclude a new Agreement from ever coming into force simply by refusing to take the necessary positive actions.

The new procedures also provide that the initial 30 days of the 90-day review period are for the Congress to consider whether an exemption of one or more of the Section 123 criteria is necessary or is inherently associated with the terms of the proposed new Agreement for Cooperation. What is not clear is what happens if the President receives Congressional advice that an exemption is needed, but he disagrees. According to the legislative history of the bill, Congress intended for the following to happen:

"For example, if during the 30-day prior consultation period either . . . Committee indicates that in its judgement the proposed arrangement is outside the parameters of the nine section 123(a) nonproliferation criteria, the Congress expects that the President will submit an exemption." [Emphasis added]

"The steps for submitting, consulting, and approving nuclear cooperation agreements . . . need not be taken in any particular sequence. It is up to the President to decide if he wants to authorize the execution of an agreement for cooperation before seeking congressional advice regarding whether an exemption is required, and thus the agreement may or may not be approved and executed prior to submission for the 30-day prior consultation review period. While the President may choose to resubmit an agreement following the 30-day prior consultation period, these amendments do not require separate submissions . . . The Congress fully expects, however, that the President will resubmit any agreement for which he has not submitted an exemption if either committee during the prior consultation period recommends that an exemption is required." [Emphasis added]

As will be seen, the Congress "expects" the President to act in accordance with its wishes but it is not in any particular position to order him to do so.

Based on our understanding of the text of proposed U.S.-Japan Agreement for Cooperation, it does not seem likely that Congress could credibly object to the Agreement on the grounds that it does not satisfy the requirements of Section 123. Nevertheless, this does not mean that such a challenge will not materialize. For example, Senator Glenn is already on record as believing that long-term programmatic approvals are not consistent with the "timely warning" and other provisions of the NNPA concerning subsequent arrangements and the contents of agreements for cooperation. Since a Congressional vote disapproving the Agreement also appears to be an unlikely scenario, the most credible method of Congressional objection to the Agreement, as noted earlier, would be to amend the Atomic Energy Act to require that all subsequent arrangements for reprocessing and retransfers of plutonium be required to go through case-by-case approval. At this juncture, we have no way of predicting whether such a Congressional initiative will be surfaced and whether it would be voted to approval if tabled. If per chance such a proposal ever were enacted, we think it would stand a good chance of being vetoed by the President, given the very adverse effect such a Congressional move would have on U.S. relations with Japan, Sweden, Norway, and on others.

Given this unpredictable climate, the fate and degree of controversy that will be associated with the new U.S.-Japan Agreement for Cooperation are not certain. What does appear certain however, is that those in the Administration who have labored so arduously to develop and negotiate this Agreement will be prepared to defend it with similar diligence.

One other issue on which we have been reporting to the Special Action Group involves the implementation of the Comprehensive Anti-Apartheid Act of 1986 (CAAA) imposing sanctions on South Africa. As will be recalled, the CAAA was enacted over President Reagan's veto on October 2, 1986. The current problem with this legislation, which could be another source of controversy between the Congress and the Administration in the coming months involves the interpretation and implementation of the CAAA's provisions particularly with respect to the uranium import embargo provisions.

On October 27, following passage of this Act—notwithstanding his veto—President Reagan issued an Executive Order delegating to specific Executive Branch agencies authority to implement identified provisions of the Act, and establishing an Inter-Agency Coordinating Committee to monitor that implementation. The Treasury Department (Customs Service) is responsible for implementing the uranium import ban. The Order does not mention the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, which has authority under the Atomic Energy Act to license the import of unenriched uranium, and which is expected soon to amend its Part 110 regulations to make them consistent with relevant provisions of the CAAA.

Questions of interpretation, not resolved by a technical corrections package (H.J. Res. 756) adopted by the Congress just before adjournment, continue to complicate efforts to promulgate implementing regulations. While there seems to be a general consensus between the Executive Branch and NRC that the import ban in section 309 of the CAAA covers only uranium ore and oxide, not UF_6, it remains unclear whether the CAAA affects South African products imported to the U.S. for processing and eventual reexport. There is also some question as to when or whether a product from South African ceases, by reason of processing in a third country, to be South African in origin for purposes of the CAAA's enforcement.

On October 14, Sen. Lugar sent a letter to Secretary of State Schultz to call attention to his views on how the ban should be implemented. Lugar specifically referred in the letter to his August 15 colloquy with Senators McConnell and Ford on the floor of the Senate, noting that:

"It was our mutual understanding that it did not reach uranium imported only for reprocessing and subsequent export. Any other interpretation of this provision would clearly be at odds with our discussion."

Lugar also stated in the letter:

"I am also advised that some question has been raised as to whether the ban extends to uranium hexafluoride. It clearly does not. Had Congress wished to include this item in the list of banned items, it would have done so expressly."

The Lugar letter reinforces the Administrations position on this issue and has reportedly caused some additional thought to be given to the "import for only transit purposes" issue. However, at this point it does not appear to have had a concrete effect on reported government agency views that all imports of South African uranium ore and oxide are included in the CAAA uranium ban. Because the Lugar-Ford-McConnell colloquy has not been printed in the Congressional Record, there is considerable doubt about its legal weight (the colloquy will reportedly be printed in the permanent version of the Congressional Record, but the Lugar-Ford-McConnell exchange obviously would have carried greater weight if it had come immediately to light). Also, the fact that the Democrats won control of the Senate in the November 4 elections and Lugar thus will no longer be chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in the next Congress may also undermine his potential influence on this issue.

Another factor complicating this situation is Senator Kennedy's recent assertion that the foregoing colloquy does not constitute "valid legislative history" and that imports "whether temporary or permanent" are covered by the CAAA. Senators Kennedy and Bingaman along with five Congressmen (including Rep. Markey), sent a letter to President Reagan objecting to the possibility that the Administration might implement the uranium ban to apply only to uranium ore and oxide. The letter states that such an interpretation would render the uranium sanction meaningless, and that the term uranium oxide is used in the CAAA as "a term of art" intended to encompass all compounds into which uranium oxide can be readily transformed. The letter adds that any other interpretation of the uranium ban would be both "irrational and counterproductive."

This letter does not have any legal force, but it and Kennedy's intervention on the floor of the Senate raise the question of what efforts will be made to addresss the various ambiguities in the provisions of the CAAA by the House of Representatives together with the new Democratic Party majority that emerged in the Senate after the November 4 elections. More specifically, if the Executive Branch implements the uranium ban to allow South African origin uranium in any form except uranium ore and uranium oxide to enter the U.S. (or, despite present indications, decides to allow temporary uranium imports into the U.S.), there is a possibility that Congress could move to amend the CAAA to apply the ban to all South African uranium imports in any form.

Because the CAAA is so full of ambiguities and inconsistencies, it would pose problems of implementation even for an Administration eager to enforce it. Under present circumstances, with enforcement to be conducted by an Administration opposed to the CAAA's enactment, the confusion surrounding implementation is as explicable as it was predictable. No matter what the Administration does in the implementation process, there will be those (in Congress, in the business community, and among anti-apartheid activists) who will criticize it for acting in a manner inconsistent with the law or its intent, as manifested by some portion of the CAAA's legislative history. Implementation activities will have a high visibility in the media, and litigation over some aspects of the Government's enforcement efforts is likely to occur. Thus, this issue too could be added to a number of contentious foreign policy issues that may be identified by the Democrats to attack the credibility of the Reagan Administration.

In the report of the Special Action Group, we have singled out two of the several nonproliferations that we identified earlier that might receive intensive Congressional attention. As we noted, however, at the outset there are others that also could arouse considerable attention ranging from the continuation of U.S. foreign aid to Pakistan, implementation of the U.S.-Chinese Agreement for Cooperation to issues associated with technology transfer.

When IEAL started to collect its thoughts for the preparation of this special report to the SAG, we anticiapted that there could be a likely upsurge in Congressional activity in the non-proliferation area and that still is our view. From an operative standpoint we expect the new U.S.-Japanese Agreement for Cooperation to be a centerpiece of discussion and in later reports we shall focus more specifically on the types of issues and questions that we anticipate will be raised when the Agreement is finally approved by the President and submitted to the Congress.

As of this writing the story about the clandestine U.S. arms sale to Iran and the siphoning off of some of the resulting revenues to the Contras in Nicaragua is creating an absolute furor in Washington. The story is dramatic and dominating the press and one can only speculate what will come next or how the Iranian story will affect the Reagan Presidency. The Administration clearly has been seriously damaged by the recent disclosures, it has not yet successfully put the issue to rest and one simply does not know where the investigations that have just been launched will go over the next several weeks or who will be implicated. Depending upon how bad things get, the course of the discussions and tensions between the Executive Branch and the Congress on nonproliferation issues clearly could be affected. If the President is able to ride out the storm without further serious damage and if an effective head of the National Security Council is appointed to replace Admiral Poindexter, the difficulties might not be significantly greater than those we have attempted to foreshadow in this report. If, however, the Administration suffers further serious damage in the next several weeks it obviously will be weakened in dealing with the Congress on all controversial foreign policy issues—nonproliferation being just one such issue among several. This could embolden the nonproliferation hardliners to be even more strident in pushing their proposals or in opposing initiatives that the Executive Branch puts forward.

Only time will tell, how touch things will really get over the next several months. Hopefully, rational views will prevail and efforts to derail the U.S.-Japanese Agreement or to pass new and unduly restrictive nonproliferation legislation will not prove successful.

It remains to be seen, however, whether our hopes in this regard will be realized.

Mr. DOLE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Republican leader, Senator DOLE.

PUBLIC FINANCING—NO!

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, yesterday, my colleagues on the other side of the aisle unveiled their campaign finance reform plan. I congratulate them on their efforts.

Although the plan's legislative language is not yet available—and although I have not seen a list of cosponsors—I know that virtually full public financing of Senate campaigns is one of the plan's key elements. I also understand that the Democrat bill does absolutely nothing to curb labor union soft-money abuses.

PUBLIC FINANCING

Last Tuesday, the Senate Republicans unveiled their own campaign finance reform initiative. The initiative now has 34 cosponsors, and I expect additional cosponsors to come onboard next week.

I am pleased that the Republican bill rejects public financing outright. No excuses. No burdens on the American taxpayer. And no taxpayer financing of politicians.

If history teaches us anything, it teaches us that public financing is bad public policy, and it is very, very expensive.

The last three publicly financed Presidential elections ate up more than $500 million in hard-earned taxpayer money—and what is worse, the system just did not work.

Believe me, I have been there. I have seen the Presidential system up close. And, today, I am still being audited by the Federal Election Commission, more than 2 years after my own Presidential campaign folded up its tent for good.

That is why the bipartisan task force commissioned by Senator MITCHELL and myself thought that copying the Presidential system—and opting for public financing—was not such a good idea after all. And that's why you can bet the house that the American people will simply not stand for yet another congressional raid on our pocketbooks and wallets.

MEETING THE SPENDING LIMIT THRESHOLD

I have had the opportunity to briefly look at the Democrat bill's spending limit proposal. According to the bill, the general election spending limit for my own home State of Kansas would be set at approximately $1 million.

Based upon my calculations, a Senate candidate in Kansas could receive $50,000 from people outside the State and contributions from just 200 Kansans—in $250 increments—and that candidate would qualify for $700,000 in direct public money and 200,000 dollars' worth of something called broadcast vouchers.

Line up $50,000 in out-of-State money, then line up 200 constitutents, and "you are in like Flynt," enjoying a huge taxpayer windfall.

This does not make sense, and it does not encourage participation by the people who ought to count—the people of our States, our constituents.

LABOR-UNION SOFT MONEY

I am also disappointed that the Democrat bill does absolutely nothing to curb the abuses of labor-soft money.

As I have pointed out before, the Labor Department estimates that unions collect more than $3.3 billion in annual dues from members and nonmembers alike—which happens to be greater than the gross national product of more than 75 countries. Needless to say, only a statistics genius can accurately estimate how much of this money actually gets pumped into the campaign finance pipeline.

No campaign finance reform proposal can call itself serious if it does not address this problem. And the best way to address the problem is to codify the principles contained in the Supreme Court's Beck decision.

PAC BAN OR PAC PLAN?

As part of its cafeteria plan approach, the Democrat bill also proposes to ban PAC contributions to Senate candidates.

That is all well and good, and I am pleased to see the Senate Democrats following the Republican lead on this issue.

But what about PAC contributions to House candidates? What about PAC contributions to the National and State parties? And what about PAC contributions to the senatorial and congressional committees?

On the PAC issue, the Republican bill doesn't fool around. It bans PAC's completely from the Federal election process.

No excuses. No loopholes. No PAC's. It is that simple.

NEED FOR BIPARTISANSHIP

Mr. President, serious and comprehensive campaign finance reform can only be achieved at the bargaining table. And it can only be achieved through the good-faith efforts of those who may hold different views about the best way to clean up the campaign finance mess.

Now that both parties of unveiled reform packages, it is time to see where there may be common ground. Senator MITCHELL and I have already talked about this, and we will continue to talk in the days ahead.

I am still optimistic about developing a bipartisan reform package, but no one should expect any miracles from the majority leader and myself. There continue to be many disagreements and many different points of view, but we will try our best to bridge these differences.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I want to thank the distinguished Republican leader for his positive comments regarding the possibility of achieving a bipartisan compromise on this subject. He has pointed out some provisions in the Democratic bill with which he disagrees, and as he noted there are likewise provisions in the Republican bill with which we disagree. But I think it fair to say that Members of the Senate on both sides share in common a recognition of the need for action and a desire to act.

It is my hope that that shared view will serve to create a momentum for change which will enable us to achieve a bipartisan result that is good for the country and will permit us to overcome the differences that clearly exist between us and which cannot be wished away or minimized.

The distinguished Republican leader and I have talked and do intend to talk further and in some detail about the subject matter, but as I have indicated on many occasions, neither he nor I is the repository of all wisdom in the Senate. This is an important subject that is of keen interest to every single Member of the Senate. Ordinarily, measures that come before the Senate are of interest to a few, sometimes many Senators, but rarely does every single Senator have a keen and specific and intense interest in the legislation.

I think it is fair to say that is the case with respect to campaign finance reform legislation, for obvious reasons. So we do hope, now that each party has presented a plan, to see if there is some way to bridge the differences between us and to proceed to reach an agreement that can command the support of a substantial majority in the Senate. I look forward to participating in that effort with the distinguished Republican leader. We have reached agreement on many difficult issues in the past. That does not mean we can do so in this case, and we may not. But I want to assure all of our colleagues and those among the American people who are interested that it will not be for lack of a good-faith effort on the part of the distinguished Republican leader and myself.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there now be a period for morning business with Senators permitted to speak therein.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SCHOOLS RESTRUCTURING ACT OF 1990

● Mr. KERREY. Mr. President, today I am introducing the Schools Restructuring Act of 1990 and am pleased to have Senators KENNEDY, PELL, SIMON, and LEVIN join me as original cosponsors.

In the months since the Charlottesville Education Summit there has been a lot of talk about education reform. I believe, however, that the reality has fallen short of the rhetoric at the Federal level. In fact, most of the action has been occurring at the local level where there are hundreds of grassroots experiments being planned or being implemented. I am disappointed with the administration's lack of leadership in this area.

The legislation I am introducing today provides Federal support for local schools and school districts that are interested in pursuing restructuring proposals. This bill is also a recognition that innovation comes from below and that it is our responsibility at the Federal level to support such innovation.

The Schools Restructuring Act establishes a program whereby a school, group of schools, or school district to schools can apply to the already existing Fund for the Improvement and Reform of Schools and Teaching [FIRST] for a 3-year grant. During that 3-year period an applicant would receive no more than $150,000 during the first year for planning purposes and no more than $2 million to implement the restructuring proposal during the second and third year. The program will require a 50-percent match from the applicant. Further, 50 percent of the local match must come from nongovernmental sources such as local community businesses interested in supporting bettering the community's schools.

If school restructuring is to be successful and thrive it will require broad community support. In order to qualify for funding the school or schools applying for funding must demonstrate that they have a plan that will involve parents, teachers, the business community, and other interested parties in their restructuring plan. As discussed above, the project must also receive some financial support from the community.

The program establishes a competitive grant system that provides funding for a broad variety of restructuring proposals that touch on school organization, school management, or instructional programs in elementary and secondary schools.

The legislation is also designed to ensure that the Federal funds are wisely used. The successful applicant will need to submit a plan for the Secretary of Education's approval at the end of the first year of funding in order to qualify for additional assistance. Finally, the schools are required to undergo an independent evaluation that will be made available to the Department and Congress.

Mr. President, this is a modest step, but the hundreds of schools and school districts, in Nebraska and all across the country, currently interested in or involved in restructuring experiments could use a Federal partner that is willing to assist. I hope that this bill will contribute to the burgeoning school restructuring movement where they are occurring—at the local level.●

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleague from Nebraska in introducing the Restructuring Schools Act of 1990. The assistance authorized by this act could go to help ensure the success of the dramatic school reforms taking place in Chicago, and to encourage other districts in need of restructuring to start the planning process.

Though dramatic in scope and complex in implementation, the concept behind the Chicago school reform is simple: each school community—made up of parents, teachers, and other community members—should run its school. But even a plan this simple does not come cheaply. Each school community had to select its leaders by ballot. That meant shifting much of the leadership of 628 schools with 410,000 students from a centralized board to 540 new local schools councils with 5,400 elected parent, teacher, and community members.

Mr. President, it takes dollars to make change, and the changes that we have seen in Chicago have not come without a substantial investment of resources. The election of the councils, the critical first step in Chicago's restructuring effort, cost more than $3.5 million. Candidates needed to be recruited; the election needed to be publicized; buildings had to be kept open; election procedures had to be developed; ballots needed to be printed. Few of these costs could be avoided without jeopardizing the legitimacy of the election, and therefore the success of the shift of power to the parents and teachers.

I am pleased to say that the investment has already yielded dividends. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert into the RECORD this brief article from "Catalyst: Voices of Chicago School Reform." It tells us a little bit about who the members of the local school councils are.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LSC MEMBERS: WHO THEY ARE

If one individual could be conjured up to typify the mass of parents now in charge of Chicago's public schools, here's how she would describe herself:

A 37-year-old mother with some college education who is not employed outside the home, is a PTA member and ran for the local school council largely at the urging of other parents.

That's the picture painted by responses to a survey of local school council members.

The survey found that 71 percent of all council members, including community members and educators, are female and that their average age is 40. Ages range from 19 to 80, with two-thirds of members between 30 and 46. Parents are the youngest, with an average age of 37, followed by teachers, 45, community members, 47, and principals, 51.

Occupations range just as broadly, including architects and attorneys at the high-income end and laborers and maids at the low-income end. Forty-seven percent of parents and 38 percent of community members listed no employment.

The reported level of schooling was surprisingly high, with 25 percent of parents and 41 percent of community members saying they had bachelor's or graduate degrees. Fifteen percent of parents and 11 percent of community members said they had not graduated from high school.

Responses to the survey indicate that many "old hands" were elected to councils—58 percent had been members of the PTA and 37 percent had been members of local school improvement councils, forerunner to today's LSCs.

About a fourth of the teachers said they are union delegates as well. On average, teachers have 21 years of experience, with an average of 13 in their current schools. On average, principals have 10 years of experience as principals, with 7 in their current schools.

Parents not only hold a majority on councils—6 to 11 seats—but also exerted the most influence in spawning candidacies. Fifty-four percent of parent members, 39 percent of community members and 32 percent of teachers said parents had urged them to run.

Children also played a role: 39 percent of parents and 20 percent of community members noted their encouragement. A boost from a principal was cited by 28 percent of parents, 20 percent of teachers and 15 percent of community members. Seven percent of members said their church had encouraged them to run. Politicians, the Chicago Teachers Union and employers exerted even less influence.

Mr. President, the school council members are the community. They are attorneys and maids, rich and poor, and all of them want to play a leadership role in improving education for the children of Chicago. A majority of the parents on the councils were urged to run by other parents. This is a victory for parental involvement, for parental empowerment.

This is only a beginning, however. The Chicago schools have not been reformed. The councils' work has just begun, and they need our help. They need training in fiscal and personnel management, leadership, group process, and other skills. They need strategies for retraining teachers, reinvigorating students, and involving parents.

Mr. President, one of the key recommendations of the Task Force on Chicago Schools, which I chaired in 1985, was that parental involvement in the schools be increased. In a recent survey, the new school council members also identified this as their No. 1 priority. But again, a simple goal can be difficult to achieve; the councils face real obstacles to success in involving parents in their children's education. For example, a study released by the Hispanic policy development project last week indicated that certain cultural differences require special strategies to increase the involvement of Hispanic parents. The councils need to know about this kind of research, they need help from experts who can give them direction in this dramatic restructuring.

Mr. President, this initiative developed by my colleague from Nebraska, and endorsed by the chairmen of the Labor and Human Resources Committee and its Education Subcommittee, will help to ensure the success of the Chicago school reform effort. And if we can turn around what was once called the worst school system in the Nation, if we can create new structures and processes for school and student success, then we are well on our way to improving education nationwide.●

By Mr. DECONCINI:

S. 2581. A bill to assist the East European countries to establish societies based on democratic institutions, a commitment to human rights, and free market principles; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

DEMOCRACY FUND ACT OF 1990

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, in August 1975 the leaders of 35 nations met in Helsinki, Finland, to sign the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, commonly called the Helsinki accords.

A mere listing of the principles contained in the agreement does not capture the ideals embodied in this document. If I can be allowed to refer to a statement I made as Chairman of the Helsinki Commission:

The Helsinki process offers a blueprint by which to build a community of nations guided by the hopes and dreams of their citizens. Their voices are urging us, now, to replace a shallow peace of guns and cement barriers with the vision of Helsinki—a lasting security rooted in respect for and protection of human rights and individual freedoms.

At the time that the Helsinki accords were signed, critics maintained that they would merely reinforce the Soviet hold on Eastern Europe, while promises to observe human rights in the totalitarian half of the continent would be cynically ignored.

Indeed, there were many times when these fears appeared justified. In 1981 the former Polish regime, encouraged by a circling ring of Soviet troops, declared martial law and crushed the trade union movement known as Solidarity. The activists of the Helsinki monitoring groups that had sprung up everywhere in Eastern Europe but particularly in Poland were repeatedly harassed and jailed. Now, only 15 years after the signing ceremony in Helsinki, Eastern Europe is moving toward true independence, democratic elections, and a free market economy. Even the Soviet Union is moving toward changes that no one would have contemplated at the beginning of the last decade.

New structures in Europe are in the process of being formed and it may take some time to see how these changes will affect the framework we established in the post-World War II period. It seems clear, however, that we are going to be facing at least four important and interrelated challenges over the coming decade:

The consolidation of democracy, free market economies, and independence in Eastern Europe;

The evolution of reform in the Soviet Union and the centrifugal forces that these changes have unleashed;

The reunification of Germany; and finally

The greater political and economic integration in the European Community.

It is not yet clear where these changes are taking us, but I am convinced that the United States must be actively engaged in the shaping of the new Europe. If we are going to play a role in this rapidly changing political landscape, we must start with a program to consolidate democracy, free enterprise, and respect for human rights in these newly emerging societies.

There have been many calls in Congress over the past 6 months for a new Marshall plan for the fledgling democracies of Eastern Europe. Other voices, including that of President Bush, have urged caution, complaining that the United States no longer has the resources to play a leadership role in the world.

Ironically, the nucleus of a Marshall plan is already being put into place for Eastern Europe, although changes in the world economy and financial system since World War II have largely obscured this fact. I will be the first to admit that the total amount of financing which will actually be available to Eastern Europe remains a difficult figure to pinpoint. However, even a conservative estimate of the money that will be available over the next 5 to 6 years—from bilateral donors and the international development banks—is in the $20 to $30 billion range.

It is a tragedy that the country that had the vision to create the original Marshall plan is being left behind in the effort to consolidate democracy in Eastern Europe. We have learned from two wars in this century the dangers of remaining on the sidelines while the map of Europe is being reshaped. American leadership is crucial to a successful Western effort.

I am introducing today, a bill to establish a fund for the reconstruction of East European democracies. This bill will authorize the President to spend up to $2 billion over the next 3 years to aid the emerging democracies in Eastern Europe to establish stable democratic institutions and the rule of law, to transform their stagnant economies to a free market system, and to clean up the environmental disaster threatening large areas of these countries and countries that are their neighbors.

Obviously cooperation with the other Western democracies will be critical for a successful program. High priority must be given to obtaining effective coordination for the bewildering assortment of assistance being offered by at least 16 governments, the Paris club, several international development banks and the international monetary fund. I hope that Secretary of State Baker will make a full accounting to the Congress of how the West is cooperating in our efforts in Eastern Europe.

Finally, we must not let the technical complexity of our assistance efforts in the six Eastern European countries obscure the purpose of this assistance. With our severe budgetary shortfalls, it is important to ensure that U.S. dollars are wisely spent and that their use is compatible with U.S. foreign policy objectives. Therefore, this legislation will condition U.S. assistance for Eastern Europe on a certification by the Secretary of State that the recipient nation is making substantial progress in the following areas:

Compliance with the Helsinki commitments regarding respect for human rights, fundamental freedoms, and political reform;

Establishing the rule of law and political institutions responsive to the will of the people;

Achieving monetary and free market reforms and implementing an effective program of privatization.

Mr. President, the changes sweeping Eastern Europe promise to usher in a very different world from the one which shaped our postwar foreign policy. We cannot be content with symbolic support for the historic changes that are transforming the eastern half of the European continent. We must show the vision and boldness that shaped American policy in the immediate postwar period.

The Helsinki process provides us with a flexible framework to guide this fragile transition period. We must be sure that the Helsinki principles, which have carried us so far, continue to underlie our relations with the European continent. This legislation that I offer today, will ensure that our efforts in Eastern Europe will embody these principles.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. Res. 307. Joint resolution designating November 11 through November 17, 1990, as "National Women Veterans Recognition Week;" to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL WOMEN VETERANS RECOGNITION WEEK

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I am introducing today, along with 57 of my colleagues, Senate Joint Resolution 307, a joint resolution designating the week of November 11-17, 1990, as National Women Veterans Recognition Week. This measure is substantively the same as House Joint Resolution 543, which was introduced by Representative BILIRAKIS on April 4.

I have long been a supporter of honoring women who served in our Armed Forces. These women, who served with honor, strength, and commitment, represent a group of veterans who have too often been underestimated, forgotten, or ignored. For far too long, the term "veteran" has meant "male veteran." It is past time to reverse this perception and to recognize the historical and growing contributions of women veterans to our national defense, particularly in times of war when they have been such a vital component of our overall national effort. Women are performing a wider range of tasks in the Armed Forces of the Nation, as demonstrated recently by the activities of women in the military action in Panama.

Because of my commitment to women veterans, I have, for the past 6 years, sponsored legislation, which the Senate and House have passed, designating a week near Veterans Day as National Women's Veterans Week. I am proud to have sponsored this legislation for so long. The principal goals of designating a week to recognize and honor women who voluntarily gave so much of themselves in service to their country are twofold: To make the public more aware of the contributions of women veterans, and to make women veterans themselves more aware of the many benefits available to them because of their service. As chairman of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, I feel strongly that it is important that we recognize the women veterans of our country and bring to the attention of our citizens the many accomplishments of women veterans, as well as the gender-specific problems they face in obtaining equitable benefits and services.

Women veterans comprise approximately 4.2 percent of the total veteran population, a percentage that is growing as the percentage of women in the active military continues to grow. However, because many of these women veterans are not aware of the implications of their status, they do not apply for various benefits and services, such as health care, education, employment assistance, and home loans, to which they may be entitled. This joint resolution and the designation of the week will continue the momentum built over the last 6 years to bring attention to this important group of veterans who have so often been overlooked.

Mr. President, I hope that the Senate will be able to act on this joint resolution in the near future.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 127—RELATING TO THE RESOLUTION OF THE GREYHOUND LINES, INC. LABOR DISPUTE

Mr. KENNEDY (for himself, Mr. D'AMATO, Mr. METZENBAUM, Mr. HATFIELD, Mr. EXON, Mr. ADAMS, Mr. BRYAN, Mr. PACKWOOD, Mr. LAUTENBERG, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. PELL, Mr. SPECTER, Mr. KERRY, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. LIEBERMAN, and Mr. CRANSTON) submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources:

S. CON. RES. 127

Whereas since March 2, 1990, 9,300 Greyhound employees have been on strike against Greyhound Lines, Inc., the only nation-wide interstate bus carrier;

Whereas nearly 10,000 communities throughout the United States served by Greyhound have felt the impact of this dispute, including significant reductions in vital bus services;

Whereas for most of these communities bus services is the sole transportation link to the rest of the Nation;

Whereas Congress is concerned about the serious loss of service, especially in rural areas;

Whereas Congress is concerned that this strike causes hardship to Greyhound employees, their families, and to the traveling public;

Whereas Congress deplores the continued incidents of sporadic violence occurring during this dispute; and

Whereas Congress believes that the best way to settle this dispute is for Greyhound and the Amalgamated Transit Union to resolve their differences at the bargaining table: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is the sense of Congress that Greyhound Lines, Inc., and the Amalgamated Transit Union should—

(1) pursue meaningful negotiations under the auspices of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service and the Secretary of Labor; and

(2) make every effort to resolve their dispute promptly and restore vital transportation services to American communities.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, today a bipartisan group of 16 Senators is introducing a sense-of-the-Congress resolution calling upon Greyhound Lines and the Amalgamated Transit Union, as they resume negotiations this weekend, to make every effort to resolve their differences at the bargaining table and bring an end to the protracted strike that has crippled the interstate bus system.

Since the strike began on March 2, 1990, communities throughout the United States—including hundreds that depend on Greyhound as their sole transportation link to the rest of the Nation—have felt the impact of this dispute through significant reductions in bus service. The strike has had its harshest effects on the poor and the elderly, who are disproportionately dependent on bus service as their primary source of transportation. And because Greyhound is a major carrier of emergency medical supplies throughout the country, medical personnel in rural areas have been particularly affected by the disruption in service.

I and my colleagues who have joined me in sponsoring this resolution deplore the sporadic acts of violence that have occurred in the course of this strike. Both the union and Greyhound have repeatedly denounced these acts of violence and have called for those involved to be prosecuted to the fullest extent of the law. I am deeply concerned, however, about the lasting hardships this strike is causing to Greyhound employees, their families, and to the traveling public. This resolution is designed to send a strong message to the parties that it is in the public interest to end this work stoppage and allow for the resumption of normal interstate bus service in our communities.

Just this week, the Director of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service and chief negotiators for the company and the union announced that contract talks would resume tomorrow. After 2 months in which there have been no meaningful negotiations between the parties, this is an encouraging development. As both sides prepare for the resumption of bargaining, we call upon them to make every effort to bring about a prompt and fair resolution of this strike and restore interstate bus service to the millions of people who depend upon it.

SENATE RESOLUTION 279—AUTHORIZING REPRESENTATION BY THE SENATE LEGAL COUNSEL

Mr. MITCHELL (for himself and Mr. DOLE) submitted the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

S. RES. 279

Whereas in the case of Anderson v. Kennedy, Case No. 90-0587, pending in United States District Court for the District of Columbia, a pro se plaintiff has asserted a claim against Senator Edward M. Kennedy;

Whereas pursuant to section 703(a) and 704(a)(1) of the Ethics in Government Act of 1978, 2 U.S.C. 288b(a) and 288c(a)(1)

(1988), the Senate may direct its counsel to defend the members of the Senate in civil actions relating to their official responsibilities: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate Legal Counsel is directed to represent Senator Edward M. Kennedy in the case of Anderson v. Kennedy.

SENATE RESOLUTION 280—RELATIVE TO SUPPORT FOR THE LATVIAN PEOPLE

Mr. DECONCINI (for himself and Mr. D'AMATO) submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

S. RES. 280

Whereas the 13 original colonies received support and recognition from the government of France following the declaration of independence from Great Britain on July 4, 1776;

Whereas the government of the United States immediately recognized the newly created, independent state of Israel on April 22, 1948;

Whereas as signatories of the 1975 Helsinki Final Act, both the Soviet Union and the United States committed themselves to "respect the equal rights of peoples and their right to self-determination;"

Where Latvia is not a territory seeking independence, but an occupied country seeking to restore its independence;

Whereas the United States and other Western Governments have never, despite fifty years of Soviet rule over those territories, recognized Lithuania, Estonia, and Latvia as part of the Soviet Union;

Whereas in December 1989, the U.S.S.R. Congress of People's Deputies condemned the secret protocols annexing the Baltic nations;

Whereas in February, 1990, the Latvian parliament also condemned the 1940 Hitler-Stalin Pact that formalized its annexation by the Soviet Union;

Whereas on May 4, 1990 the government of the Republic of Latvia voted 139 to 56 to address a declaration of independence proclaming the beginning of a period of transition leading to full independence, effectively restoring the independence Latvia enjoyed from 1922 until its incorporation by force into the Soviet Union in 1940 under the terms of the illegal Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact; and

Whereas the United States has a long and proud history of supporting freedom and self-determination for oppressed peoples throughout the world: Therefore be it

Resolved, That:

It is the sense of the Senate that the government of the United States:

(1) immediately offer its moral support for the Latvian decision to seek its independence from the Soviet Union, and

(2) urge the Government of the Soviet Union to respond to the Latvian offer to enter into negotiations with the elected officials of the Republic of Latvia leading to full independence for the Republic of Latvia.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, Latvia's first democratically elected parliament in more than 50 years convened yesterday for the first time. Today, they will almost certainly fulfill the mandate of the people of Latvia and declare Latvia's independence from the Soviet Union.

Latvia, like its Baltic neighbors of Lithuania and Estonia, was illegally annexed and occupied by the Soviet Union as a direct result of a secret deal between Josef Stalin and Adolf Hitler in 1939. During the past 50 years, the United States has maintained a consistent policy of nonrecognition of the incorporation of the Baltic States by the Soviet Union.

Over the course of the past 2 years, a period marked by the openness that Soviet President Gorbachev has promoted, the people of Latvia have responded. They have taken forceful democratic votes, for the first time, and elected representatives to go to the parliament. They have voted on a number of different issues, including independence from the Soviet Union.

The demographic situation in Latvia has made the drive for that state's independence far more complicated than that in neighboring Lithuania, where Lithuanians make up over 80 percent of the population. In Latvia, the indigenous population comprises only 53 percent of the population as a whole.

It is clear that sometime today they will vote out the nine-point program toward independence and they will take a cautious approach toward the Soviet Union by asking for a dialog, by giving the Soviets ample time to offer what they think is necessary for a confederation or whatever other arrangement they might have.

Nevertheless, the Latvians have followed closely in the footsteps of the Lithuanians: in December, the parliament abolished the Communist Party's monopoly on power; in February it condemned the Stalin-Hitler pact that paved the way for the Soviet occupation, and last month a large segment of the Latvian Communist Party broke from the Moscow-based Communist Party of the Soviet Union.

Perhaps most significant in the Latvian independence drive were the results of the March 18 parliamentary elections. Pro-independence candidates, largely represented by the popular front of Latvia, won some 140 of the Parliament's 201 seats. It is this faction which will dominate the vote on independence today.

The current conflict between the Soviet and Lithuanian governments over Lithuania's March 11 declaration of independence has not dampened the Latvian will. The Latvian parliament, has, however, decided not to declare unilaterally their independence as did the Lithuanians, but to proclaim the beginning of a period of transition to full independence. In the interim, the proposed declaration calls for negotiations with Moscow.

Anatoly Gorbunov, who yesterday was reelected President of Latvia by an overwhelming vote, has said that he does not expect the West to come running to the defense of Latvia independence. Indeed, it is not our place to force any sort of outcome in the relationship between the Soviet Union and the Baltic States. But our voice must be loud in insisting that these relationships be resolved in full respect of the rights of the Baltic peoples.

The people of Latvia, and their representatives in the parliament, have shown great courage. They have moved peacefully and rationally in their pursuit of self-determination and their right to do so must be defended.

Time and again I have spoken here about the U.S. obligation to fulfill the principles set forth in the 1975 Helsinki Final Act. In particular, our commitment to the self-determination of peoples must be firm. Self-determination means the right of peoples to choose their own path. The people of Latvia today are making a choice. We must offer open support for that choice.

Today, Senator D'AMATO is joining with me to introduce a resolution calling upon the U.S. Goverment to support the Latvian decision to seek its independence from the Soviet Union. Further my resolution urges the Government of the Soviet Union to respond to the Latvian offer to enter into negotiations with the elected officials of the Republic of Latvia leading to full independence for the Republic of Latvia.

Mr. President, going back to Latvia, I have just received word that the Latvian Parliament has voted to begin the independence process by a vote of 138 to 0. I congratulate the Latvian Parliament and the Latvian people for their willingness to continue this bold fight for independence and freedom. I think the United States should stand with them, and hopefully that is exactly what we will do.

I want to also thank Frank Parker, James Fisher, Chip Walgren, and Laurie Sedlmayr of my staff, and others who helped prepare this legislation I introduced on the Eastern European Development Fund.

TO ENHANCE RESEARCH ON OSTEOPOROSIS

● Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, next week I intend to introduce a bill which, if it becomes law, should improve the Federal Government's research effort on osteoporosis. I will be introducing this legislation in anticipation of National Osteoporosis Prevention Week, May 14 through 18. Representative OLYMPIA SNOWE, with whom I have collaborated since at least 1985 on osteoporosis initiatives, including osteoporosis commemorative legislation, and with whom I collaborated in the development of this bill, will introduce it in the House of Representatives.

Osteoporosis is one of the major debilitating diseases of old age, affecting especially, but not only, older women. Investment in further research on osteoporosis will lead to greater understanding of the disease and, especially, how to prevent it and how to treat it once it has developed. Given that we face, in the not very distant future, great increases in the number of older people in our society, given that each generation of older people seems to have a higher incidence of osteoporosis, it is clear that we must find ways to reduce or eliminate this disease.

Osteoporosis is a condition, which develops in an individual over many years, characterized by weakening of bones which make those individuals susceptible to fractures of the hip, spine, and wrist.

Over an estimated 27 million Americans have this disease or related bone disorders. Many do not know that they have it, because the condition develops without symptoms until stress on the bones causes fractures. It is estimated that this condition is responsible for as many as 1,300,000 bone fractures annually, including 250,000 hip fractures, 200,000 wrist fractures and 500,000 vertebral fractures.

This disease is an enormous burden for our older population and an enormous burden on the Nation. It is not unusual for those who fracture hips in old age to end up incapacitated and even in nursing homes. Those older people who fully recover mobility after hip fractures are very fortunate.

The direct medical costs of osteoporosis reached an estimated $10 billion in 1988. This figure does not include the cost of family care or lost work for those, usually family members, who are caring for those with the disease.

I will introduce this bill in order to foster more research on this disease within the Federal Government. Currently, the funding for research on this disease at the National Institutes of Health is only a tiny fraction of its direct medical costs. The bill will therefore authorize additional funds for research on osteoporosis for the lead agency on the disease, the National Institute of Arthritis and Musculoskeletal and Skin Diseases, and for the National Institute on Aging, which also conducts research on the disease. The bill will also have several other provisions designed to help eventually eliminate this disease as a public health problem.

I can summarize the bill briefly. It will authorize:

An additional $24 million for research on osteoporosis at the Arthritis Institute and an additional $12 million for such research at the National Institute on Aging for fiscal years 1991 through 1993.

An Interagency Coordinating Council on Osteoporosis and Related Disorders to help coordinate research and priority setting for research on osteoporosis within the Department. No funds are appropriated for this Council.

An advisory panel, comprised of non-Federal experts on the disease, to make recommendations for research and education and other health promotion activities, to the Congress and to the Department. The bill authorizes $200,000 to defray the costs which will be incurred to enable the panel to meet and to conduct business for fiscal years 1991 through 1993.

Three health promotion model projects which will seek to discover the best ways to conduct education and health promotion activities aimed at three key population groups: Young and teenage girls, midlife women, and older men and women. The bill authorizes $375,000 for each of fiscal years 1991 through 1993 for these projects.

A resource center on osteoporosis which will compile information on osteoporosis and disseminate it broadly to interested parties. This authority also provides for a hot line telephone service to make appropriate information available to those who wish to have such information, such as those with the disease and their families, and professionals of various kinds working in the field. The bill authorizes $500,000 for the first year of this activity, $350,000 for fiscal year 1992 and $400,000 for fiscal year 1993. The resource center is also authorized to charge appropriate fees to help defray the cost of providing materials, paying for postage, and running the telephone hot line.

Mr. President, there are many working in the field of osteoporosis who do believe that we have it within our power to eliminate this disease as a public health program. As a lay person, I am unable to say whether this is true. But it does seem to me that efforts to increase the research on osteoporosis and related disorders will help to reduce the burden created by this disease, and I hope that this bill will contribute to that end.●

COMMUNITY SERVICE

● Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. President, Wednesday's Baltimore Evening Sun contained a brief commentary by author Barbara Gordon that moved me. From my days as a social worker in the neighborhoods of Baltimore, to my service in the Senate, "community service" has been both my calling and my career. I am deeply troubled that community service could now be seen not so much as a selfless commitment to one's neighbors, but as a celebrity alternative to doing hard time.

I'm not saying that community service can't be an appropriate penance. But when rich and famous individuals, shielded by their $100,000 defense teams, use community service as the easy way out of a criminal conviction, both the phrase and the activity are cheapened.

I am proud of my community service record in a way that Zsa Zsa Gabor and Oliver North never will be and never could be. I ask that Ms. Gordon's column be included in the RECORD.

The article follows:

AMERICA'S GRAND CELEBRATION OF LOSERS WHO SOMETIMES GET COMMUNITY SERVICE

(By Barbara Gordon)

Maybe the mists of time have clouded my memory, but I always thought people active in community service were considered public-spirited citizens—role models. Today, the phrase has taken on a whole new meaning: punishment.

Given our overcrowded prisons, the enormous expense of building new ones and the staggering costs of keeping prisoners behind bars, community service is being heralded as a prudent form of punishment: It saves dollars as well as souls.

Oliver North, Leona Helmsley and Zsa Zsa Gabor have all been found guilty of various crimes. Each has been sentenced to perform community service.

Perhaps some adults can make sense of this trend, but how do you explain to a child that North—a man shown to have a fleeting relationship with the truth—had to be ordered to do 1,200 hours of community service instead of going to jail? That a woman found guilty of withholding millions of dollars in taxes was ordered to spend 750 hours helping others (in addition to jail)?

Doesn't the public have a choice? Suppose parents are less than thrilled with the idea of North doing his community service as part of their children's civics lesson. If Zsa Zsa Gabor paid her debt to society partly by working in a hospital, not all people would be enchanted by having her minister to their loved ones.

And the downtrodden, homeless and needy—how do they feel about swarms of felons swooping down on them. What about their choices?

It's important that people with short memories recall that not so long ago—before Watergate, Iran-contra, junk bonds—community service was inspired only by public-spiritedness and generosity.

Believe it or not, there are people who, without charisma or notoriety, work among the needy, not because they are sentenced to do so by a judge but rather because they are moved by the dictates of their own hearts. They are the real role models.

COMMEMORATING THE 199TH ANNIVERSARY OF POLISH CONSTITUTION DAY

● Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I am proud to join with people of Polish descent worldwide in commemorating this very special 199th anniversary of Polish Constitution Day. For nearly two centuries, the spirit of the Polish people has kept alive the fight for freedom, democracy, and the Constitution. It has been a long, arduous struggle, but Poland has once again reclaimed the rights embodied in its Constitution of 1791.

Just 2 years after the adoption of the United States Constitution, this historic Polish document abolished class distinction, established full religious toleration, and declared the equality of all citizens under the law. The 1791 Constitution remains a remarkable achievement in the history of the Polish people, and by the standards of any age or people it remains an eloquent declaration of political freedom and religious tolerance. It is an expression of the courageous spirit which against all odds has survived centuries of violence and oppression, and which has served as a beacon of hope as the Polish people have overcome a repressive government.

Across the country, the Polish American Congress, a national organization with chapters in all major cities, will celebrate this historic event on Sunday, May 6, 1990. In Maryland, the anniversary will be marked by our distinguished Polish community at Baltimore's Polish Home Hall where ceremonies underscoring the meaning and importance of this occasion will take place.

I commend the officers of the Maryland Chapter of the Polish American Congress who have devoted so much time and effort to planning and arranging this important occasion: Melvin Laszczynski, president; W. Milan-Kamski, first vice president; Mieczyslaw Piatek, vice president; Alfred Wisniewski, vice president; Theresa Violanti, financial secretary; Gertrude Jankowiak, recording secretary; Walter Skalniak, treasurer, and Joseph Sempeck, sergeant at arms.

A brave people, long recognized for their chivalry and compassion, the Polish people have for generations struggled for liberty and freedom, a struggle which led them to carry on their national banner the motto "For Our Liberty and Yours." Time and time again their land has been attacked and occupied by aggressive neighbors, yet the proud and noble people of Poland have repeatedly fought bravely against threats to their homeland.

For nearly 130 years, following the partitions of 1792 and 1795, the Polish State ceased to exist. It was literally erased from the globes and atlases of the world, and denied a seat at the world's conference tables. Poland's sovereignty was restored in 1919, but for most of the last century Poland has been subjected to brutal occupation and a harsh and repressive government.

The memories of the past decade are especially vivid. The emergence in 1980 of Solidarity, as the Solidarity Labor Federation is known, was followed a year later by the banning of the labor movement, the imprisonment of its leaders, and the imposition of martial law on the nation. Despite the action taken against Solidarity, however, it was not possible to suppress the spirit which brought Solidarity to life. The working men and women of Poland stood fast. The union and its affiliated organizations became the rallying point in the continuing Polish quest for justice and liberty.

Today, the Republic of Poland is committed to a democratic path, but building democratic institutions is not easy. This is especially true in a time of severe economic constraints and hardship. In Poland, food is in short supply. Factories, housing, schools, hospitals, and the environment have all been ravaged by 40 years of Communist mismanagement, and the economy must be rebuilt from the bottom up. These first courageous steps have been taken as Poland moves to reclaim the precious birthright which the 1791 Constitution represents.

The quest for justice and liberty as promised by the Polish Constitution is at last being realized. With positive leadership, with hope in the future, and faith in the potential of this great nation we once again see a free Poland, ready to fulfill the highest ideals and aspirations of its people.●

TRIBUTE TO NOTA M. WILKERSON

● Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I rise today to pay tribute to Mrs. Nota M. Wilkerson of Chattanooga, TN.

Mrs. Wilkerson will retire on June 1, 1990, after completing 47 years of Federal Government service. She began her Federal career with the Army Transport Command, U.S. Army Air Force, in June 1943. She transferred to the Social Security Administration in December 1945, where she has served continuously ever since. For the last 10 years, Mrs. Wilkerson has been the congressional liaison contact representative for the Chattanooga Social Security District Office and is fondly referred to as "Mrs. Social Security."

Born and raised in White County (Sparta), TN, Mrs. Wilkerson graduated from Pleasant Hill Academy in Pleasant Hill, TN, and the Edmondson School of Business in Chattanooga. During her 45 years of service with the Social Security Administration she has been a capable and dedicated employee. Her diplomacy and expertise have combined to promote an outstanding working relationship between congressional offices, the Social Security Administration, and the public. The administration formally recognized her excellent work by presenting her with their Superior Service Award in 1986.

Mr. President, good Federal employees like Nota Wilkerson are the backbone of the U.S. Government. She has set an example for other Federal employees to emulate, and we in Congress should recognize her for a job well done. While she will be missed by her friends, colleagues, and the public, her retirement will give her an opportunity to pay more attention to her husband, George, her children, and grandchildren. I commend Mrs. Wilkerson for her outstanding public service and wish her many more years of health and happiness.●

COMMENDING THE UNIVERSITY OF MIAMI'S CHAMPIONSHIP FOOTBALL TEAM GRADUATES

● Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. President, this month, on May 11, the University of Miami holds its graduation ceremonies. Among the students graduating will be 15 senior members of the university's championship football team.

This spring, I had the privilege of meeting those young men at a ceremony in the White House Rose Garden that was held to honor the team's accomplishments during the 1989 season. Those accomplishments included an 11-1 record, a Sugar Bowl victory and, finally, a national championship title.

Today, I want to congratulate the University of Miami football team not only on those on-the-field statistics but, more importantly, on its equally impressive numbers inside the classroom.

Mr. President, 15 of the team's 18 senior members are scheduled to graduate this month. That is a graduation rate of 83 percent. Last year, 16 of 19 senior football players graduated from Miami, an 84 percent rate. The high rate of graduation is well above the national average for top intercollegiate football programs.

This year's graduating seniors are Michael Azer, Andrew Lee Berry, Bernard Clark, Dale Dawkins, Mark Thomas Evans, Robert Garcia, Robert Lee Harden, Jason Hicks, Roderick Holder, Jimmie Jones, Timothy Jon Kalal, Bukasa Kalombo, Dennis Kelleher, Gregory Mark, and Willis Peguese.

That list includes four young men, Bernard Clark, Robert Garcia, Dennis Kelleher, and Gregory Mark, who finished their degree requirements within 4 years. Dale Dawkins, the leading receiver on the 1989 team, is graduating in 4 years after sitting out his freshman year under the proposition 48 requirement. Another senior player, Mike Sullivan, actually completed his undergraduate degree in 3½ years and now is using up his football eligibility while pursuing a master's degree in business.

These young men are a testament both to the University of Miami's commitment to academic excellence and its continued record of athletic achievement. University President Edward T. Foote, Athletic Director Sam Jankovich and Head Coach Dennis Erickson are to be commended for their leadership in ensuring that the University of Miami is truly producing student athletes.●

JERUSALEM

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I am pleased the majority of the Jewish settlers who have been occupying St. John's Hospice in the Old City of Jerusalem have agreed to leave that site.

I welcome this move because I believe Israel made a mistake in not being responsive to the religious sensitivities involved, and in not being straightforward about Government financing of the settlers' attempt.

Throughout her troubled history, Israel has always deserved and needed friends—and this is no less true today. Events like this recent attempt to forcefully break down longstanding divisions in the Old City do not serve to further Israel's overall interests, or advance the peace process.

It is reassuring that the Israeli court system has the independence to challenge the government. However, it is too bad it is necessary. I hope this matter can be settled quickly, and the property restored to its rightful inhabitants.●

NOTICE OF DETERMINATION BY THE SELECT COMMITTEE ON ETHICS UNDER RULE 35, PARAGRAPH 4, PERMITTING ACCEPTANCE OF A GIFT OF EDUCATIONAL TRAVEL FROM A FOREIGN ORGANIZATION

The select committee has received a request for a determination under rule 35 for Jon Lerner, a member of the staff of Senator BOSCHWITZ, to participate in a program in Germany, sponsored by the Hanns Seidel Foundation, from May 1 to 10, 1990.

The committee has determined that participation by Mr. Lerner in the program in Germany, at the expense of the Hanns Seidel Foundation, is in the interest of the Senate and the United States.

The select committee has received a request for a determination under rule 35 for Mr. Gordon MacDonald, a member of the staff of Senator HUMPHREY, to participate in a program in the Republic of China, sponsored by the Soochow University, from April 8 to 14, 1990.

The committee has determined that participation by Mr. MacDonald in the program in the Republic of China, at the expense of the Soochow University, is in the interest of the Senate and the United States.

The select committee has received a request for a determination under rule 35 for Dr. Patricia Ruggles, a member of the staff of the Joint Economic Committee, to participate in a program in Canada, sponsored by the Statistics Canada from April 22 to 24, 1990.

The committee has determined that participation by Dr. Ruggles in the program in Canada at the expense of the Statistics Canada, is in the interest of the Senate and the United States.●

Mr. LIEBERMAN. Mr. President, I have just had the pleasure, along with several of my colleagues in the Senate, of meeting with Prime Minister Kazimiera Prunskiene right here at the Capitol and I am pleased that I had the opportunity to tell her how much the people of Connecticut, particularly the Lithuanian Americans of our State, support her country's quest for freedom.

I hope, too, that she will forgive the reception that she was given at the White House yesterday. I gather that she had to pull up to the gate and show her credentials and walk alone from her car to the door of the White House. One of our constituents who signed up for a tour of the White House would have received a warmer reception, and although I know that our Government has not yet extended diplomatic recognition to the new Government of Lithuania, it seems to me that the Prime Minister, as a leader of a previously oppressed people, struggling for freedom, deserved better treatment from the U.S. Government.

Mr. President, it was nearly 27 years ago that President Kennedy delivered a magnificently eloquent speech on the role of what he called the little nations of the world. He spoke in Dublin, and he said that "no nation, large or small, can be indifferent to the fate of others near or far."

It was in that speech he quoted George Bernard Shaw and said those words that everybody has repeated so many times since then. "We need men who can dream of things that never were, and ask why not."

Today we would do well to listen to the words that immediately followed that oft-quoted line. "It matters not how small a nation is that seeks world peace and freedom," President Kennedy said. "For * * * the humblest nation of all the world, 'when clad in the armor of a righteous cause, is stronger than all the hosts of Error.' "

Mr. President, today Lithuania is clad in the armor of a righteous cause; but unfortunately, the administration of our Government is clad in what might be called a leisure suit of indifference. We encouraged the Lithuanians through the darkest hours of the cold war and urged them to keep their faith in freedom, for one day, we said to them, it will come. Today that day has come, and we are silent, painfully silent.

To hold our tongues at a time when Lithuania cries out for support is, in my opinion, to deny our heritage. Have we forgotten the words that made us free? "When a long train of abuses and usurpations," reads our Declaration of Independence, "evinces a design to reduce them under absolute despotism, it is their right, it is their duty, to throw off such government, and to provide new guards for their future security."

Mr. President, July 4, 1776, was not a convenient time for the King of England to accept a Declaration of Independence from the American Colonies, just as March 11, 1990, was not a convenient time for President Gorbachev to accept a Declaration of Independence by the Lithuanian people. No time is a good time for oppressors when the oppressed seek to be free.

What would Thomas Jefferson have said, had the King asked the colonists for just 5 more years to work things out? He would have said what he did say. "A prince, whose character is thus marked by every act which may define a tyrant, is unfit to be the ruler of a free people." So spoke Thomas Jefferson.

The people of Lithuania have endured with "patient sufferance" the rule of communism for half a century. I do not wish to support a policy that asks them to be patient and suffer any longer. That is why I supported the resolution in the Senate that would have called for immediate diplomatic recognition of the new Government of Lithuania, and that, in fact, is what the Prime Minister Kazimiera Prunskiene asked us over and over again, as the most concrete expression of American support. But more than that, the clearest measure of a statement to the Soviet Union, to President Gorbachev, that the Lithuanians are not a people alone, but that other of the great powers of the world stand with them in their quest for freedom.

She made very clear to us her belief that it is possible for the United States, if it exercises strength here, to have both good relations with President Gorbachev and the Soviet Union, and diplomatic relations with the new Government of Lithuania.

That is also why I supported a resolution which passed the Senate by an overwhelming margin, that urges the President not to submit a United States-Soviet trade agreement to this body before the Soviet Union has lifted its embargo against Lithuania and has entered into negotiations with the Lithuanians that will lead to Soviet recognition of that government.

Mr. President, I hope that Prime Minister Prunskiene will take the news of this Senate resolution home with her as evidence that support does exist for the people of her country, and the support is strong and will not waiver.

Thank you, Mr. President. I yield the floor.

Mr. DECONCINI addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the unanimous consent agreement, Senator DECONCINI is recognized.

PRIME MINISTER PRUNSKIENE'S APPEARANCE BEFORE HELSINKI COMMISSION

Mr. DECONCINI. I want to join my distinguished colleague from Connecticut in the strong support and compliments to Prime Minister Prunskiene, and particularly for her testimony both yesterday to the Helsinki Commission here in the U.S. Senate, and her visit with the Foreign Relations and Foreign Affairs Committee, and with different Senators. She made it very clear I think, that the people of Lithuania are a little bit like the people of the United States, wanting their independence. They are hoping that we will not be silent as to this recognition.

It is my firm belief that all of us are grown up enough to know the situation in the Soviet Union could be classified precarious. But it is also important that we not foresake principles that we have stood for for so long, by failing to give public recognition by our Government of the Governments of Lithuania, Estonia, and Latvia.

The history is very clear. We have never recognized the Soviet Union annexation of Lithuania in the Ribbentrop-Molotov secret agreement in 1939. We, in the Western nations, have stood for a long time, not recognizing that annexation. The Supreme Soviet this year went on record indicating that they themselves would not recognize that annexation, or that agreement.

Now for us to stand and say that we are with you, we know you want freedom, we know that it is important, and we are for freedom and we are for independence, but not to voice these sentiments fully with a formal declaration of recognition, is to me a mistake.

I have had the privilege, as many of us have, to listen to Vaclav Havel, the President of Czechoslovakia, to Lech Walesa and Mr. Mazowiecki, the Prime Minister of Poland and other leaders who have come before the Congress. They have met with us, and sometimes we have given joint sessions for them.

I think that Prime Minister Prunskiene laid it out very clearly, that Lithuania realizes the sensitiveness of this issue, that indeed they welcome the French and West German suggestion. But they also feel that once you do suggest, you have some responsibility to be a participant, to find a resolution.

The Lithuania people have offered to negotiate. They have offered to delay any action toward independence and suspend other legislation of their Supreme Soviet, in Lithuania. They realize it is going to take some time, but they have to talk to somebody, and they are here talking to us the American people. And they are here saying, recognize us formally, as you have said all these years honoring Captive Nations Week and as you have said in speeches and in the nonrecognition of the Soviet annexation of those Baltic countries.

I repeat, Mr. President, this body has had the privilege to receive some of the greatest statesman from around the world in the historic halls of our Congress. All Members of Congress had the opportunity to hear Vaclav Havel, playwright, philosopher, and President of Czechoslovakia, when he addressed the joint session of Congress earlier this year. Following the liberation of the Philippine people, we had the privilege to hear from President Aquino. And in that tradition, yesterday I had the privilege of receiving Lithuanian Prime Minister Kazimiera Prunskiene at a hearing I chaired of the Helsinki Commission [Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe].

Prime Minister Prunskiene, the leader of a small brave country which has long suffered the oppression of the Soviet Union, had remarkable and inspirational things to say about restraint in the face of provocation and her countries determination to regain its independence. Even while facing economic stragulation by the Kremlin, she stood firm on the question of Lithuanian independence. She made clear that the Lithuanian people will never accept the cynical pact between Hitler and Stalin which illegally annexed Lithuania into the Soviet empire.

At the same time, Prime Minister Prunskiene made clear that Lithuania wants to resolve this intolerable state of affairs by dialog and negotiation. She accepted the French and German proposal that Lithuania temporarily suspend implementation of its laws relating to independence while negotiations with the Soviet Union were started. She made it clear that she did not bear a grudge against the country which has long oppressed her homeland when she stated that "the Lithuania question can and must be solved without damage to democracy in the Soviet Union."

I believe that President Bush can benefit from this remarkable woman's clear insight and realistic assessment into the views and thinking of the Kremlin leadership. He should pay attention when she says that "pressuring the Soviet Union on the Lithuanian question helps rather than hinders Mr. Gorbachev to be a consistent practitioner of democracy." The President should take to heart her observation that the West does "not have to choose between Lithuania and Gorbachev." Prime Minister Prunskiene met with President Bush yesterday and I hope the President was listening.

Mr. DECONCINI. I ask unanimous consent that the statement of Prime Minister Prunskiene, as presented to the Helsinki Commission on May 3, 1990, here in the U.S. Senate be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS OF THE PRIME MINISTER OF LITHUANIA, KAZIMIERA PRUNSKIENE TO THE HELSINKI COMMISSION, THURSDAY, MAY 3, 1990

For some time now, Lithuania and her Baltic neighbors have been reminding the world of the fact of their existence and, by doing so, have aroused worry as well as interest.

The Lithuanian question did not arise because it was arbitrarily willed by someone or in order to frustrate someone else's will and desires. The restoration of an independent Lithuanian state was a legal act, expressing the nation's self-determination and its right to full sovereignty. By international agreement, this is a political right of all nations.

The most important preconditions for the restoration of independence were:

1. The Lithuanian nation's long-standing desire, shared by the other two Baltic nations, for independent statehood, which was given expression by its democratically elected parliament.

2. The refusal of other states around the world to recognize the annexation of Lithuania by the Soviet Union.

3. Political changes under Mr. Gorbachev which permitted the Soviet Union itself to declare the Hitler-Stalin pact null and void.

The act entitled "On the Restoration of an Independent Lithuanian State" which was passed by the Lithuanian parliament on March 11 begins to establish our state sovereignty. We have enacted a legal, de jure sovereignty which will require much effort and a certain amount of time in order to be realized de facto.

By no means does the Lithuanian parliament and government believe that de facto independence can be grabbed unilaterally and quickly, especially when dealing with the Soviet Union with its deep-rooted imperial traditions.

Lithuania does not want to burden Mr. Gorbachev with her problems, complicating his situation and raising a danger to his leadership or to perestroika, a danger that has been dramatized around the world. Lithuania also does not want to shift her problems onto the West. Nevertheless, these three sides—the Soviet Union, Lithuania and the West—are drawn together through the Lithuanian issue. How the question is solved will depend first of all on the people of Lithuania themselves, on their unity, determination, calm and so long as the economic blockage lasts, on their stamina and enterprise as well. The people are showing the world tht they do have those qualities.

The roles of East and West in the resolution of the Lithuanian question are complicated by a series of factors:

1. The Soviet Union does not have a balanced equilibrium of political forces. Although the influence of the democratic forces is increasing, it is not yet equal to the other side. The democratic forces are only starting to consolidate and often clash among themselves. From what I have observed, Mr. Gorbachev does not make full use of support from the democratic forces to overcome the reactionaries.

2. The western nations, thanks to whose non-recognition policy Lithuania was able to preserve the legal continuity of her independence, became accustomed to her factual dependence. They valued Mr. Gorbachev's perestroika as a way of ensuring human and national rights to the point that the process began to be valued more than the goal—the realization of these rights.

It is difficult for the West to perceive that pressuring the Soviet Union on the Lithuanian question helps rather than hinders Mr. Gorbachev to be a consistent practitioner of democracy more than that, to overcome the reactionary forces which oppose not only independence for the Baltic states but also political and economic reforms in general. The West's position now, during a period of economic difficulties for the Soviet Union, can be one of the most important arguments for a decisive turn to reform. This argument would have been ineffective several years ago, for it is only now that the people dare to contradict the government and raise demands.

Lithuania is undergoing a great testing, but so too is the Soviet Union as well as the West. What sort of Russia or Soviet Union will emerge depends in part on how the Lithuanian issue will be resolved. This is understood by the democratic forces supporting us in the various Soviet republics and regions such as Moscow, Leningrad, Sverdlovsk, etc., where the newly-elected governments are sympathetic to us.

As regards the role of the West, we see and understand their desire to have in Mr. Gorbachev a reliable political leader in East-West relations. Here our interests coincide. But, for this we cannot sacrifice everything that is most important—the nation's future and its very existence. Such a sacrifice is senseless and not useful even to the West itself, because Lithuania's sacrifice would not help the Soviet Union enter a new stage of development as a nation of laws and a reliable economic partner for the West.

In other words the Lithuanian question can and must be solved without damage to democracy in the Soviet Union. In fact I would contend that the recognition of Lithuania's independence by East and West would be a tremendous victory for democratization in the Soviet Union within the context of perestroika. This political puzzle belongs to a former stage, since the majority of western states are sympathetic to Lithuanian independence.

You do not have to choose between Lithuania and Gorbachev. The solution is this: Gorbachev together with a breakthrough for democracy in the Soviet Union and an independent Lithuania. These are two compatible and converging sides of the same process, rather than alternatives.

I do not contend that Mr. Gorbachev's preferred scenario for Lithuania coincides with Lithuania's own aspirations. I think that he would speak out for Lithuania remaining in federation, although not by force. However, even the world's darling does not have the monopolistic right to decide the fate of other nations. And here we cannot help him at all. For otherwise sympathy degenerates into toadyism, and the latter gives birth to a cult.

Lithuania cannot demand support—she has neither the political nor the economic strength to do so. She is also prevented by an understanding of an elementary truth, that every state and its leaders have their own problems and their own interests.

Our hope lies not only in other nations' moral principals but also in the advantage which other states will sooner or later see in Lithuanian statehood and the role that she can play between East and West. This role will be the result both of her geopolitical situation and of the Soviet Union's abandonment of its imperial inertia, which we are testing at great risk and will have helped to shake up, if we are successful.

Even at present, when heads of state are not hurrying to put economic pressure on the Soviet Union or to help Lithuania, the world's attention is already a significant form of support. In such a situation, it is hard to imagine that the Kremlin, blockading us from the East, would succeed in isolating Lithuania from the West as well, preventing us from associating with the rest of the world. This would mean economic destruction, hunger, and the use of cold as a weapon (a literal cold war).

Until the last few days, the Western nations confined themselves to urging both sides to start negotiations. President Mitterand's and Chancellor Kohl's proposal for a temporary suspension of the execution of the Lithuanian Parliament's decisions, as a condition to spur the Kremlin to negotiations, significantly changes the situation. By this act these heads of state became in effect participants or mediators in the solution of Lithuania's problems, although they did not express such an intention. To suggest a course of action means at the same time to take on a certain amount of responsibility.

Lithuania's leadership, understanding that the path of no compromise in the execution of the enacted legislation is impossible, and appreciating the importance of guarantees by other states, is disposed to consider such a formula. But it must be stated without ambiguity or the possibility of different interpretations. We could temporarily suspend the quick and unilateral execution of the passed legislation if there were international guarantees. In no way does this mean a repeal of the acts passed on March 11 or a renunciation of independence. In such a case Lithuania would have to be guaranteed on the basis of international law: the continuity of Lithuanian independence, the continuation of her government and her territorial integrity.

The government of the Republic of Lithuania has proposed more than once to the leaders of the Soviet Union that we start a dialogue in search of compromises, naming a number of possible areas, such as: the reconciliation of military and defense interests, guarantees for civil rights of Soviet citizens in Lithuania, the division of wealth, and so forth. Concrete details would become clear during negotiations. The Soviet side did not express interest in conducting such negotiations. Compromises cannot all come just from one side, or they are no longer compromises, but rather the subjugation of the weaker by the stronger.

The Soviet Union, in demanding that the Republic of Lithuania repeal the acts of March 11, at the same time recognizes their validity, because the Soviet Government itself cannot legally annul them. The economic blockade also confirms the factual separation of Lithuania from the Soviet Union, after which any pretensions to Lithuania as part of the Soviet Union's territory are no longer possible.

The attempt to force Lithuania to renounce her independence through economic coercion will not succeed, and will only create new socio-economic and political difficulties for the Soviet Union itself. The people's dissatisfaction with the individuals who made such decisions is growing. Meanwhile, Lithuania, although under very difficult conditions, is looking for alternative sources of needed materials, including those in the eastern market. Only by using the Soviet army would it be possible to totally interrupt barter exchanges of goods between Lithuania and her eastern trade partners within the Soviet Union. And the path leads from such exchanges to full market relations.

Lithuania is going through difficult times, deprived of oil, most of her gas, metal and other important products. A transportation and banking blockade is in effect. Enterprises are closing, unemployment has appeared. However, there is also some good resulting from all this, for it gives us the chance to develop speed, initiative, enterprise and market methods. We intend to hold out and survive, because there is no road back.

The approaching summit meeting between the American and Soviet presidents—the leaders of the world's largest nations—could make a decisive contribution to the solution of the Lithuanian problem. Fate is giving them the chance to leave an admirable mark in history, starting a new epoch in Europe and in relations between West and East. We trust that they will do so, not only because their nations expect this, but also because they will be guided by the internal moral code of popular, democratic leaders.

THE VISIT OF PRIME MINISTER PRUNSKIENE

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, in private conversation today with Lithuanian Prime Minister Prunskiene and listening to her address a group of Senators, I was struck by her composure and conviction and by the evident resolve of the Lithuanian people. I am more convinced than ever of the need for a clear and active United States policy toward Lithuania.

A peaceful diplomatic solution to the crisis can and must be found. The United States must do everything possible to facilitate that goal.

We must make clear to President Gorbachev the need to not only agree to resolve the dispute peacefully, but to take concrete steps toward that end.

I am disappointed by President Gorbachev's actions, which have created new obstacles to a peaceful solution. I am also disappointed by President Bush's failure to respond to those actions. Although the economic embargo is not military force, it was instituted to coerce Lithuanian leaders to accede to Moscow's terms. Clearly, such action does not represent a good-faith effort to facilitate fair and meaningful negotiations.

I believe, as I told President Bush and Prime Minister Prunskiene, that the United States should go beyond condemnation of such actions to concretely demonstrate our objections to the coercive course the Soviet Union has pursued.

In expressing our disapproval of the measures already taken, the United States must make clear our view that further Soviet sanctions would throw into question President Gorbachev's stated commitment to a peaceful resolution of the dispute.

For negotiations cannot be conducted on a fair or reasonable basis if one party continues to attempt to oppose its terms by pressuring the other. As I told President Bush, there cannot be meaningful dialog, let alone negotiations, if one side holds the other by the throat.

There must be a fair exchange of views. There must be an atmosphere of mutual respect. Soviet actions have undermined the basis for such free discussions and a solution based on equity and compromise. The United States seeks a peaceful resolution of current conflict, but we must not leave the impression that we believe a negotiated solution can be borne out of economic coercions.

We should not lead President Gorbachev to infer that the United States supports or condones his decision to cut off supplies of vital raw materials to Lithuania. Yet I fear that the United States, by virtue of President Bush's failure to take concrete steps to express our opposition, may be leading Gorbachev to precisely that conclusion.

The Senate recently passed a resolution that should help clarify its views toward Soviet actions. The Senate resolution made clear that approval for a new commercial trade agreement with the Soviet Union should be withheld until the Soviets lift their economic embargo and enter into meaningful negotiations with Lithuania.

I urge President Bush to consider this approach and to take steps that would reinforce this message to President Gorbachev.

We in America have supported Lithuanian independence for 50 years. We do not intend to take any action that would result in delaying the realization of the Lithuanian people's desire for freedom.

But America must be consistent and American policy must be clear. We must demonstrate to the Soviet Union that economic coercion is incompatible with fair and meaningful negotiation.

We must do everything possible to facilitate a peaceful route to full independence for Lithuania, and neither the United States nor the Lithuanian people should be misunderstood.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

RECORD TO REMAIN OPEN UNTIL 2 P.M.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask unanimous consent that the RECORD remain open today until 2 p.m. for the introduction of bills and statements.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection it is so ordered.

ORDERS FOR MONDAY, MAY 7, 1990

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 11:30 A.M.; MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today it stand in recess until 11:30 on Monday, May 7; and, that, following the time for the two leaders, there be a period for morning business not to extend beyond 12 noon with Senators permitted to speak therein for up to 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SCHEDULE

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, on Monday the Senate will resume consideration of S. 135, the Hatch Act reform bill, at noon, with the following Senators being recognized to offer first degree amendments: Senator DOLE, to offer two amendments; Senator ROTH, to offer one amendment; and then Senator SIMPSON, to offer one amendment. During Monday's session, there will be debate only relative to those amendments with any rollcall votes to occur on Tuesday morning.

Mr. President, the two amendments that were offered today were tabled by voice vote and, therefore, rollcall votes will not be necessary on those amendments on Tuesday morning. The maximum number of amendments, then, which will be voted on on Tuesday morning will be the four amendments to be offered on Monday, if they are not otherwise disposed of on Monday.

I am advised by staff that both majority and minority staff have consulted and determined that the most favorable time for Senators on both sides on Tuesday for votes to commence will be 11:30 a.m. Therefore, it is my intention, unless the distinguished Republican leader or another Senator prefers a different time, to plan to commence those votes, however many are scheduled, and we will not know that until the close of business on Monday, for on or about 11:30 a.m. on Tuesday morning.

Mr. DOLE. We have no objection to that time.

Mr. GLENN. Reserving the right to object, I will not object, would it be possible for us to get copies of those amendments so we can study them over the weekend? We do not have copies yet.

Mr. DOLE. We will try to do that this afternoon. I cannot speak for others, but at least my staff.

Mr. GLENN. I would appreciate it, so we can get them and look at them in advance.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I am not putting a unanimous-consent request to the Senate now. I am merely stating my intention to schedule those votes on Tuesday morning. I will do so at the conclusion of business on Monday when we have a specific knowledge on what votes will be required and which amendments.

RECESS UNTIL 11:30 A.M. MONDAY, MAY 7, 1990

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senate stands in recess until 11:30 a.m., Monday, May 7.

Thereupon, at 1:27 p.m., the Senate recessed until Monday, May 7, 1990, at 11:30 a.m.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to announce that pursuant to clause 4 of rule I, the Speaker signed the following enrolled bills earlier today:

H.R. 1472. An act to establish the Grand National Recreation Area in the State of Michigan, and for other purposes; and

H.R. 3802. An act to designate May 1990 as "Asian/Pacific American Heritage Month."

THE FAMILY AND MEDICAL LEAVE ACT

(Mrs. SCHROEDER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, this is a wonderful week in which we will really be able to test whether we are or are not a kinder and gentler Nation. We are going to be taking up the Family and Medical Leave Act, and what we will be doing, if we pass that act, is catching up with every other western industrialized nation.

Mr. Speaker, all this bill will do is give 12 weeks of job protected leave to a young woman or man upon the birth or adoption of a baby to try and solidify that family.

My colleagues, we in America must deplore the fact that our families are breaking apart at a 100-percent faster rate than any other country and that we are not doing something about allowing our families the time to bond together. Every country has done this.

If we pass this act, we will still be doing less than every other country, but at least we will be trying to help young families start building before it all tumbles.

So, Mr. Speaker, I really hope Members pass this legislation. We must catch up. We are in this global economy where we are going to have to have that, and I think we can no longer tolerate the drug rates and crime rates in this country without dealing with the very root cause of what is driving them, as we have seen by study after study.

LATVIANS JOIN THE RANKS OF THOSE WHO PRESS FOR TRUE SELF-DETERMINATION

(Mr. BEREUTER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Speaker, 1989 was a remarkable year—one that witnessed the nations of Central and Eastern Europe cast off the totalitarian dictators who have ruled for over four decades. One by one, Poland, East Germany, Czechoslovakia and the rest embraced democracy and respect for basic human rights. It was a force that could not be stopped.

The year 1990 is provding to be no less remarkable. The Baltic States that were illegally seized by the Soviet Union in 1940 have pushed ever further toward independence. Lithuania, as we all know, has pressed its claim forcefully, and has sought to compel the Soviet Union to grant independence. While less immediate in the details of their demand than Lithuania, Estonia has similarly expressed its clear intention on independence from the Soviet Union. And, last Thursday, May 3, the duly elected Latvian Parliament voted 138 to 0 to declare itself "an independent democratic republic."

The people of Latvia have made it clear that they do not seek confrontation or violence—they wish nothing more than to be free. Latvia's President, Mr. Anatolijis Gorbunovs, has indicated his desire to negotiate a separation from Moscow. He had made it clear that they do not wish to disrupt the East-West dialog. Latvia does not want to push Mr. Gorbachev into a corner and force him to lash out in violence. But they have an unquenchable thirst for freedom. They will no longer be satisfied to take their orders from Moscow.

Mr. Speaker, this Member congratulates the people of Latvia on the occasion of their declaration of independence. Certainly it is clear that the very best wishes of Members of the Congress of the United States enthusiastically go to the Latvian Parliament, which has taken this courageous and unanimous vote, as well as to Latvia's President—the Honorable Anatolijis Gorbunovs. It is this Member's most sincere desire that a negotiated but expedited separation from the Soviet Union can be reached, so that true self-determination for this tiny Baltic State will be restored. All of America wishes them well, but this Member extends the special enthusiasm and support from the strong and significant community of Latvian-Americans in Lincoln, NE.

CHAIRMAN ANNUNZIO PROMOTES COLUMBUS COIN FOR YOUNG SCHOLARS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, as the Members know, I have sponsored legislation to honor the greatest explorer in history, Christopher Columbus. More importantly, however, the Christopher Columbus Coin and Fellowship Act legislation will create scholarships to assist new explorers in their search for discoveries which can benefit mankind.

More than half the Members of the House have joined me in sponsoring this bill. Any member who has not signed on is certainly welcome to do so. I hope the House Subcommittee on Consumer Affairs and Coinage, which has already held a hearing on the legislation and at which I testified, will act on the bill shortly and send it to the full Banking Committee for approval. There is no doubt in my mind that the legislation will reach the House floor rapidly and be sent to the Senate where I believe positive action should be taken. The bill would then be sent to the White House for President Bush's signature.

Mr. Speaker, I urge enactment of this legislation which will commemorate the 500th anniversary of the arrival of Columbus in America. The importance of this Italian's discoveries cannot be overstated. Before his discovery, Europe placed its focus on the East. Afterwards, the emphasis was to travel to the West.

There have been many arguments over whether Columbus was the first to reach the New World or whether Etruscans, Phoenicians, Norsemen, or others were the first to come and even settle. Similarly, there are arguments over where Columbus first stepped ashore in the New World.

All these arguments miss what made Columbus' discovery so momentous. It was Columbus' discovery alone which led others to follow in his footsteps, to change the focus on Europe from East to West.

A significant element of the legislation is the funds it will raise for the nonpartisan Christopher Columbus Foundation which will award fellowships to explorers in all fields. The hardest part of the journeys of Columbus was not the sailing but the arranging of the financing for the trips. The Columbus Fellowships will help new explorers who need financial aid.

Our Nation's first commemorative coin was struck in honor of Columbus. It is only fitting that the 500th anniversary of his discovery of America be noted by the striking of a coin which will reward scholars who also want to make their mark on the world.

Mr. Speaker, the legislation calls for the minting of 11 million coins—1 million gold $5 pieces, 4 million silver dollars, and 6 million clad half dollars. The coins will be dated 1991 and 1992, with different designs the second year. The trade publication on coinage, Numismatic News, believes the legislation could well create the largest commemorative issue of coins in history. It is my calculation that if all the coins are sold, more than $69 million would be raised for the Columbus Fellowship Foundation.

The United States is the most innovative country in the world. We have the best thinkers. We have the most creative thinkers. But the gap between us and the rest of the world is narrowing. We must maintain our edge. The Columbus Fellowships are one way to do so. The fellowships will support those individuals whose work may lead to new discoveries in medicine, electronics, engineering, chemistry, or whatever field or profession they choose.

SENATE—Monday, May 7, 1990

(Legislative day of Wednesday, April 18, 1990)

The Senate met at 11:31 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the Honorable JEFF BINGAMAN, a Senator from the State of New Mexico.

PRAYER

The Reverend John E. Stait, Office of the Chaplain, U.S. Senate, offered the following prayer:

Let us pray:

And in the first year of Darius the Mede, I arose to be an encouragement and protection for him.—Daniel 11:1 NAS.

Father in Heaven, it is so easy to think that only those who are known, chronological leaders are making history. But we consistently read throughout scripture that what Your sons and daughters were doing, quietly and faithfully with no fanfair or applause was what was really making history in antiquity.

Help us today on Capitol Hill to be Your servants. Help us know that no matter how insignificant others may make us feel, we are making history. That we might be an encouragement and protection to those we serve. Help us rest in the assurance that the record is being kept and our labor is not in vain. As it is written; "Yes," says the Spirit, "that they may rest from their labors, for their deeds follow with them."—Revelation 14:13 NAS. Amen.

APPOINTMENT OF ACTING PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will please read a communication to the Senate from the President pro tempore [Mr. BYRD].

The legislative clerk read the following letter:

U.S. SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, DC, May 7, 1990.

To the Senate:

Under the provisions of rule I, section 3, of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby appoint the Honorable JEFF BINGAMAN, a Senator from the State of New Mexico, to perform the duties of the Chair.

ROBERT C. BYRD,
President pro tempore.

Mr. BINGAMAN thereupon assumed the chair as Acting President pro tempore.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The majority leader is recognized.

THE JOURNAL

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Journal of the proceedings be approved to date.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SCHEDULE

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, this morning, following the time for the two leaders, there will be a period for morning business not to extend beyond 12 noon with Senators permitted to speak therein for up to 5 minutes each.

At noon today, when the Senate resumes consideration of S. 135, the Hatch Act reform bill, under the provisions of the unanimous-consent agreement of last week, the following Senators will be recognized to offer amendments.

Senator DOLE will offer two amendments. Then Senator ROTH and Senator SIMPSON will offer one amendment each.

Any rollcall votes which may be needed to dispose of these listed amendments will not occur today but will occur tomorrow morning beginning at approximately 11:30 a.m.

Last Friday the Senate defeated by voice vote two amendments offered by Senator ROTH that were part of the above-mentioned consent agreement. Therefore, on Tuesday only the four amendments listed for today and any relevant second-degree amendments will require rollcall votes if needed to dispose of them.

It is my hope and intention, as I stated last week, to complete action on this bill as early as possible this week. That means that there is the possibility of late-night sessions beginning on tomorrow, should the necessity arise, in order for the Senate to complete its work on this important legislation. And I urge Senators to take that into account in preparing their schedules for the remainder of this week.

RESERVATION OF LEADER TIME

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my leader time and I reserve all of the leader time of the distinguished Republican leader.

MORNING BUSINESS

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, there will be a period for the transaction of morning business not to extend beyond 12 noon today with Senators permitted to speak therein for not to exceed 5 minutes each.

EXTENSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the period for morning business be extended until 12:30 p.m.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, in view of the hour, I ask unanimous consent that I might proceed as if in morning business for 10 minutes.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is in morning business from now until 12:30.

Without objection, the Senator may proceed.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I appreciate that.

THE DEFICIT

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, the Senate and the public generally will have seen accounts of the meeting which took place yesterday at the White House among mainly the President, his principal advisers, Mr. Sununu, Mr. Darman, Secretary of the Treasury Brady, and the Senate leaders and House leaders of the Democratic and Republican sides equally.

The announcement in the press is that President Bush and Hill leaders agree to pursue deficit talks. This comes as a change in the position of the administration. The effective position was that there was nothing to talk about. It comes in response at least to two things.

● This "bullet" symbol identifies statements or insertions which are not spoken by a Member of the Senate on the floor.

The first is the realization sinking in at the administration and widening in the Nation itself that the budget deficit is in fact much higher than is admitted, much higher than is depicted in the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings discourse or in the President's budget message to us; that as Mr. Stockman said in 1983, the budget deficit is "$200 billion as far as the eye can see." We have, in fact, a $200 billion deficit now rising to about $270 billion at the end of the decade.

The deficit is compounding because the debt is compounding. We tripled the national debt in 8 years. In those 8 years the previous administration borrowed in constant dollars 85 percent of the amount of money borrowed in the Second World War, such a large sum that it now takes nearly half the income tax to pay the debt. More graphically, Mr. President, particularly from your part of the world, it takes all of the income tax collected west of the Mississippi River to pay the interest on the debt now. That is the legacy of the 1980's, the largest transfer of wealth from labor to capital in the history of our political economy. We tax persons' incomes that they acquire by work, and we pay it to bondholders who typically have had the capital which they invested in Treasury securities and receive the interest as return on capital, which is to say wealth from labor to capital, the largest in our history.

The second reason we suddenly have an administration prepared to have talks is that the deficit is even larger than was anticipated. The return of the revenue from the corporate income tax is not what it was expected to be, and there are other factors that I am sure the Senate is familiar with, including the prospect that interest rates will be higher than the rosy scenario usually depicted them as being.

I suggest, Mr. President, there is a much larger overriding fact, and that is the administration is beginning to understand that the Congress may not be willing to let the administration continue to use the revenues of the Social Security system as if they were taxes collected for general purposes. They are not. If anyone would bother to look at their paycheck, they will see a line for the income tax and they will see a line marked FICA. That stands for Federal Insurance Contributions Act.

Those are contributions to a retirement and survivors trust fund, and a disability trust fund. Those are insurance premiums. They are not general revenue. And yet, Mr. President, they are being used as if they were.

The misuse of the trust funds is the most egregious breach of trust with which this Government has involved itself in as long as anyone can recall. It is a new subject. We are learning the subject. There has never been a major surplus in these trust funds. They were a pay-as-you-go system for decades.

In that year, here on this floor, and in the House, we put in place a series of rate increases, the last one of which took effect on schedule on January 1 of this year, which would produce a partially funded system. We would, in fact, save against future, try to create wealth that would throw off income when needed at a time in the third decade of the next century when there will be only three workers actively contributing to the Social Security trust fund for every one retired person.

It is a technicality, but not an inextricably complex one. The technicality is, the only way money can be saved, in an economic sense, is to have a current operating budget that is balanced, such that the Social Security surplus buys down the privately held Treasury debt. That in turn translates into saving in the private sector.

Now, the power of these surpluses, the size—not only the surplus, but the size, Mr. President—the Social Security surplus is now rising at $1 billion a week. By 1995, it will be rising at $2 billion a week. By the year 2000, $4 billion a week; until the year 2015, $8 billion a week.

At the same time, there are certain costs in Government that are going down, principally the military. As the cold war concludes, the Warsaw Pact has disappeared, any country which, has, as we do, 323,000 persons in 14 NATO countries, is going to see that decline.

I point out sir, that the 250th largest school district in the United States is actually located in West Germany, the Federal Republic of Germany.

Those costs are going down. This morning we learned that the most respected chairman of the Joint Chiefs, Gen. Colin Powell, is talking about a time when the military will have a budget a quarter less than it does now.

Now, the combination of a declining defense outlay and a rising Social Security surplus clearly impressed itself on the administration earlier this year, or late last year, I should say. When the administration came to office, they let it be known, they asked for the term slide-by budget, the one that was introduced in January 1989. Get that out of the way. We will have major talks for a grand accord before the calendar year 1989 was over.

But, then the slide-by budget slid by, and there were no talks, no discussions of any kind. A few meetings about the budget agreement, but no effort to put our finances in order.

Why? Well, I do not know and I do not know that any of us does; and I am not sure in the administration they have ever reached a moment of decision. But, surely the basic fact is they saw that the Social Security surpluses, if they could be used as if they were tax revenues, would enable the administration to say they kept a pledge of no new taxes; would, in the phrase of George Will, rent the White House well into the next century.

Well, one does not blame people who see their opportunities. The only blame attaches with those who do not recognize what is going on.

And so, at the end of the last year, Mr. President, I said that we would do what, over and again in 1988 and 1989, the Subcommittee on Social Security heard should be done if the Social Security surpluses are not saved. If they are not saved, they should be returned to the people who pay them, the employers as well; for the simple reason that they are not there as general revenue.

Now, over and again we had the GAO, the General Accounting Office, come and tell us this is what we should do. We had immensely able public men, such as former Chief Actuary, Robert Myers, who was the executive director of the National Commission on Social Security Reform, 1982–83, who said these revenues are not going to be saved so go back to pay-as-you go.

Well, it became clear that the use of these revenues as if they were general revenue and not insurance premiums was going to be challenged in the Senate, as it will be by myself, by others. It has been made clear in the House, as the distinguished Member of the House leadership has said, that if the issue were to come to the House from the Senate, there would be 400 votes for it there.

Now, it is obviously beginning to be clear to the administration that they cannot depend on the unchallenged availability of Social Security premium moneys to be used as if they were general revenues of a general tax. And so they begin now, at long last, to say, "Shall we talk about the public finances?"

Well, fine. And you know it is what you would have hoped was going to happen last year. It did not. It may happen this year.

But, Mr. President, on this side, there was something disquieting in today's account of yesterday's meeting, to wit, that the issue of Social Security seems not to have been raised.

I would have hoped that on our part, the part of the Democratic leaders—and mind, I must say I do not know this to be the case, I only know what was reported—there was a clear caveat which was presented to the President and his advisers saying: Sir, you must know you cannot depend on the continued use of Social Security surpluses as general revenues for general purposes.

Mr. President, I observe the hour. I had asked for a lesser period in morning business but I also observe that no Senator is seeking recognition. I ask that I might continue as I am doing now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURDICK). The Senator may continue.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, that point needs to be made from the Senate floor, that any comprehensive budget summit must take into account the fact that there is growing judgment in this body and in the other body that there is a breach of trust involved in using trust funds as if they were revenues, general revenues, tax revenues, when they are a pension system, retirement system, insurance system against disability, and then death.

There was an occasion, Mr. President—I know the Presiding Officer will recall this—when Senator HEINZ from Pennsylvania, our good Republican colleague, was asked did he agree with a characterization I had made that what was going on was thievery. Actually that was a quote from the Rochester Democrat and Chronicle, an editorial about one of the hearings we had held in 1989 on this matter. And Senator HEINZ said: "No. Certainly not. What is going on is not thievery. What is going on is embezzlement."

We can have our choice of terms, but either way this is not something sustainable by a legitimate government, which ours is. You cannot embezzle trust funds.

Obviously, technically it would not be so, but Senator HEINZ was very clear that it is the equivalent of embezzlement in the private sector. Governments do not go to jail.

Although, I note, to this day, Mr. President, there are places for two public trustees on those trust funds. We created those public trustees in 1983. Those positions are vacant. The administration has not given us any names. Can it be they do not want public trustees because they might go public with what is going on? I do not want to characterize motives but, as I pointed out before on this floor, there are no public trustees, which is inexplicable and disquieting.

So I wish to say, Mr. President, as these talks go forward, the participants ought to have in mind that on this floor there will be a vote, and more than one, if need be, to return the Social Security surplus to the Social Security contributors.

There are many cases for this. The most important is simply the elemental matter: You do not abuse trust funds.

But there is another matter, too. Such a move would increase the disposable income of 132 million Americans by upwards of $600 a year. Millions and millions of two-earner families would see their income go up by as much as $1,200 a year. And beyond that, inasmuch as half the Social Security contribution is made by the employer—half employee, half employer—the half that comes from the employer is seen as a wage cost, and it is a wage cost. If that wage cost is cut I think the generality of economists would agree that the savings will be shared between employer and employee. Wages will go up.

It is not something we should ignore. Mr. President, it is strange and striking how much we do ignore the fact that median family income in the United States today is lower than it was 15 years ago. It is lower because the earnings have not increased and Social Security contributions have increased. Using the figures from a year ago, we can calculate the shortfall at $452 less than 15 years earlier. It is probably something less than that today. But, still, it is a period without equal in American history.

Never in our history have there been 15 years, a half a generation, in which the median family saw nothing improved in the way of its income. And that at a time, sir, when millions of wives went to work just to keep the family income where it had been. Last year factory wages were $20 a week less than they were in 1970 in real terms. We never had anything like that happen in our history. It is astonishing to contemplate.

I do not know what is more astonishing, the fact that this has happened or the fact that there is so little comment about it on the Senate floor and in the general political discourse of this time. We do not talk about it. It is because we do not know about it or we are ashamed about it? I do not know which, maybe both and maybe neither.

But, in that setting it really does devolve upon this body to ask, ought we to be using insurance contributions, collected on the first dollar of income but not collected at all after $51,300 of income, the most regressive of payments? If it were a tax it would be the most regressive tax conceivable. The poorest people pay as much as the richest people, and after a point people who are very well off pay nothing, they having paid up to their maximum.

As an insurance premium that is not regressive at all. You get what you pay for. But as a tax it would be intolerable. We amended the Constitution to establish a graduated income tax. Are we going to repeal it by the Social Security Amendments of 1977? We never intended anything of the kind. And that fact, it seems to me, is not the least important. Congress never meant these moneys to be used as revenues for general purposes of Government. They never had been and ought not to be now.

We are using $1 billion a week. And if that were not bad enough that we are using these revenues as if they were taxes, we learn in the morning's press that, and I will simply read the story by John Yang and Steven Mufson in the Washington Post which begins dealing with the idea that there will be no preconditions to these talks. It says:

> For the Democrats, no preconditions would mean a willingness to discuss such politically sensitive items as paring Social Security cost of living increases.

It goes on to say that Mr. Darman, the Director of OMB, has said there that such programs—and there are others, Medicare and farm subsidies—"are taking over the Federal budget."

Mr. President, there is a moment when patience is strained. The idea that the simple commitment that Congress made in 1972 to maintain the value of retirement benefit by adjusting it for cost of living is somehow taking over the Federal budget does not bear close scrutiny.

Here are the facts, Mr. President. We estimate that the 1991 Social Security cost-of-living adjustment will be 4.1 percent. That would come to $7.4 billion in a budget that will be $1.1 trillion or more, much less than 1 percent of the budget. It would be much less than one-tenth of 1 percent of the budget, but, in any event, Mr. President, paid for.

In fiscal year 1991, the Congressional Budget Office estimates that the Social Security surplus will be adding $76 billion to the revenues of the Federal Government, which are not meant to be tax revenues, but money does come into the Treasury. That is all after having paid for the cost-of-living adjustments. The cost-of-living adjustment, as the distinguished Presiding Officer well knows, is not an increase in benefits. It simply makes people whole. It simply offsets when otherwise there is a drop in benefits owing to a rise in prices.

If you come to 1 year, you say it only costs $7.4 billion; that is all we are taking out of the checks of the 39 million Social Security recipients. No, that money comes out every year for the rest of the lives of the pensioners. It is a base they do not have, and so it does not count in future increases. It is gone for good. It is next year, the year after that, the year after that, and the years that follow.

If that is what the budget summit is all about, getting agreement to reduce the cost-of-living adjustments for the Social Security retirees, I do not know whether we should go to such a summit. If the issue of the misuse—the term "embezzlement" has been used—of the trust funds is not to be discussed but, indeed, we are going to talk about how to increase the size, the amounts of moneys being so misused, what is that summit? Is it for us to say we will allow that to happen to people whose trust we hold, to whom we have made a commitment?

No. From the first, let us be clear. Congress has stipulated in the Social Security Act that the terms of the Social Security payments, the various programs are subject to change and they have, indeed, been changed. But there is a profound moral assumption that the cost-of-living adjustments will be made so that benefits are not cut. Certainly, not as if there is a crises in the funds, we might have to do that and indeed we did for a 6-month period in 1983. We had to get out of a situation that required that kind of responsible judgment, and nobody objected. But now the funds are in enormous surplus and yet we want to cut benefits. That case to be made directly. If the President wants to make that case, he surely can do and has every right to do, and I, for one, would welcome it, to talk about it. But just to let it slide into the discourse on the grounds that the cost-of-living adjustment is taking over the budget? Nonsense, Mr. President.

Let us, by all means, proceed with these discussions but, let them be above board. Let it be understood that the use of Social Security revenues, as if they were general revenues, as if they were taxes—Social Security contributions are not taxes, and if they are going to be used as such, then everybody involved and responsible has to acknowledge what they are doing and admit what is going on. For my part, Mr. President, I do not think such a measure could be sustained. I do not think the American people want it. I think it is a breach of trust. I think it is a misuse of trust funds and abuse of trust funds.

My colleague from Pennsylvania, on the other side of the aisle, said it very well when he said it was not thievery, it was embezzlement. So I, Mr. President, hope that as these budget talks go forward there be some acknowledgment of what has been called embezzlement and no disguising of what is already an unsustainable, unsupportable practice.

Mr. President, I thank the Chair for its close attention, and seeing no Senator seeking recognition at this point, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

DEFICIT REDUCTION

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I wanted to comment very briefly on the meeting at the White House last night with four leaders and the President of the United States with reference to deficit reduction, or a so-called budget summit. That word "summit" is overused around here. But first I want to thank and applaud the President for calling us together, and then thank the participants: The Speaker, Congressman FOLEY; the Republican leader in the House, ROBERT MICHEL; our majority leader, my colleague, Senator MITCHELL; and myself; in addition, Secretary Brady; the OMB Director; Dick Darman; Chief of Staff John Sununu, and the President.

It is fair to say that, as has already been reported, if in fact there are negotiations, we first must have some agenda, we must have some goals. Why are we doing it? What is the purpose? It seems to me there are a lot of good reasons we could set out.

One, we are paying about $180 billion a year in interest. Two, we are worried about inflation. Three, we are worried about interest rates. Four, we are worried about a lot of trade problems. There are a number of reasons to try to get together.

So we need to outline our goals, how much we intend to reduce the deficit. There are all kinds of speculative numbers around, but maybe it could be a package as large as $155 billion, which is a lot of money, a lot of reduction, revenues or whatever.

We need to identify who will make up sort of the negotiating A team, which members of the House and Senate will sit down and really start the nitty-gritty work of going through the numbers, and then how we communicate to the rest of our colleagues on both the Republican and Democratic sides so that in addition to the three or four people we may have on the negotiating team, we are able to keep informed other Members who have very important roles to play in the final analysis, in the final product.

So, obviously, yesterday was an hour and a half meeting discussing generally if we wanted to do it, and tomorrow we will ask our Republican colleagues, I understand Senator MITCHELL will ask his Democratic colleagues, and I believe the answer will be in the affirmative; we need to do it.

The American people should be pushing us to sit down and make tough decisions about the deficit. We cannot continue to spend more money and more money and more money and run up the deficit. I hope that the American people will support us when we make some tough decisions and some tough votes.

I happen to think it is good policy and also good politics. And I say politics because this is an election year and the common wisdom around here is that you cannot do it because it is an election year. If we do it and do it fairly quickly, we could complete our action on all this before the August recess—it would seem to me the American people will have an opportunity to understand that we did do the right thing for the right reasons: We are concerned about their children and their grandchildren—then I believe we would have widespread support, bipartisan, nonpartisan support around the country.

So again I congratulate the President for taking the initiative, and I hope that it is just the first meeting in what may be a fruitful conclusion and a meaningful deficit reduction within the next few months.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

FOUR YEARS AFTER CHERNOBYL

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I rise today to commemorate the victims of the explosion of the No. 4 nuclear reactor at Chernobyl, in the Ukraine, in Russia and to call on the Soviet Government to be forthcoming with information regarding the events surrounding this accident, especially regarding the health effects upon those people contaminated by radioactive fallout.

Four years ago last week, the No. 4 reactor at Chernobyl Nuclear Power Plant exploded, ejecting vast amounts of intensely radioactive fission products directly into the atmosphere. As a result, a large portion of the Ukraine as well as significant portions of Western Europe were contaminated with radioactivity.

While Soviet officials have stated that only 31 people were killed from the accident in November 1989, the newspaper Moscow News reported that 250 people who were at Chernobyl during or after the accident have died. In addition, the U.S. National Research Council has estimated that over 70,000 people can be expected to die from cancers caused by Chernobyl.

Over 12 million acres of land in the Ukraine, including some 8.6 million acres of agricultural land, have been heavily contaminated.

As many as 200,000 Soviet citizens have been evacuated from areas surrounding the crippled reactor because their homes have been contaminated. The Soviet Government has recently announced that 14,000 more people will be relocated out of that area, but 200,000 more are still living on land that is still significantly contaminated by radiation.

Mr. President, it is imperative that we learn from the events of Chernobyl. We are not just trying to castigate the Soviets. It is a terrible thing that happened there. We want to learn more about it. No one can promise absolutely that an event of Chernobyl proportions will not occur elsewhere in the world. Should another such disaster happen, the responding country would most certainly benefit from the Soviet Union's experience in the aftermath of the Chernobyl explosion. The world could benefit greatly by hearing about the cleanup and radiation isolation techniques the Soviets developed following Chernobyl. The health and epidemiological data gathered in the wake of this accident could help us understand the effects of radiation from any source, not only from accidents. That kind of information would allow us, for example, to refine models which predict cancer rates from exposure to radiation.

Mr. President, the Soviets have endured at least one other severe radiation accident—in the vicinity of Kyshtym in the Ural Mountains in 1957. I call upon the Soviet Government to make available further information regarding the radiological aftermath of this event as well. We know now that an explosion in a high-level nuclear waste tank at the nuclear weapon production facility released at least 20 million curies of radioactivity into the environment. We do not know the full impact of this accident on the area surrounding the facility nor its effect on the people who were contaminated. Since we have similar waste tanks at Hanford and Savannah River, such a disclosure would be helpful as we continue our oversight of these facilities.

Mr. President, the Ukrainian people have suffered more than any others and will continue to pay for the Chernobyl accident in terms of their health and livelihood for years to come. I believe it is imperative that my colleagues join me in urging the Soviet Government to do all it can to prevent future accidents by acting to lift the veil of secrecy from these past accidents. Putting glasnost into practice in this way helps mitigate the damage should such an accident again happen. By releasing all relevant data from Chernobyl and Khystym events, the Soviets have the opportunity to contribute significantly to a better understanding of radiation and its potentially deadly effects on us when accidents occur.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

TERRY ANDERSON

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, today is the 1,878th day that Terry Anderson has been held captive in Lebanon. The question arises, How should this or any nation respond to such cruelty? Mr. President, for more than 200 years this Nation has been committed to the idea that nations must act with law on their side and not simply indignation in their hearts. Lately we have been drifting away from this notion. But, with the cold war coming to an end and a new era of violent ethnic conflict beginning, we must return to the idea that rules are needed to restrain the cycle of violence. Without such rules much of the world may come to resemble Lebanon.

Others have said that the plight of the American hostages in Lebanon is outrageous. It is. More to the point, however, it is illegal. I made this point last August 2 when Col. William R. Higgins was murdered. I made the same point last April 27 when I reminded my Senate colleagues that the Geneva Convention Relative to the Treatment of Prisoners prohibits "at any time and in any place whatsoever" the "taking of hostages." Israel in particular has an interest in making the rules of international law more, not less effective. Some Israelis have been held hostage for as long as 8 years without a word as to their whereabouts or safety. Thus, I am confident that Israel desires to support these norms. Prisoners may—indeed, should—be tried and punished for violating civilized norms. That is one way to strengthen the rules. Not every prisoner is a hostage. But, prisoners held for the express purpose of trading them for persons and other advantages are hostages and should be released.

PLAYING A PRUDENT GAME

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I have never met the new Governor of the Commonwealth of Virginia, L. Douglas Wilder, and I do not belong to the same political party. We are of different races. But judging by reports of his policies and statements, he is both wise and courageous in the manner he is searching for solutions to his State's economic problems. It may be that he is in the process of restoring some fundamental principles to not only his political party but to the political process itself, principles which both Democrats and Republicans in Congress should be embracing. As the first black Governor in the history of his State, Governor Wilder is a welcome contrast to some other leaders, white and black, around the country in both parties.

In a column published this morning, the respected syndicated columnist Donald Lambro began by saying that Governor Wilder "thinks his party might have more success in future Presidential elections if it begins emulating his commonsense, largely conservative approach to government."

Mr. President, the political easy way out these days is to demand that President Bush disavow his 1988 campaign commitment, "Read my lips, no new taxes." To my knowledge, Governor Wilder has made no such demand. Instead, the Governor of Virginia has eloquently condemned the tax-and-spend theory of government. Moreover, he has shown courage in opposing new government programs in his State. He has called on institutions in his State to tighten their belts. He has advocated the death penalty for drug crimes, and so on and on.

Mr. President, I know better than to attempt to make a personal assessment from afar of a man I have never met, let alone watched in action firsthand. But based on what I am hearing and reading, I believe Governor Wilder may prove to be a breath of fresh air amidst a cacophony of politicians who are forever taking the easy way out.

I may not agree with all of the Governor's statements and actions, but thus far he is a man who is surely doing a lot of good in a lot of ways. I view him as a man who is a credit to his State, and in the process I hold the notion that he is doing a great deal to build mutual respect among the races. Certainly he is building respect for himself. As the television announcer on one of the commercials puts it, the Governor is doing it the old fashioned way: He is earning it.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Donald Lambro's column "Playing a Prudent Game" be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PLAYING A PRUDENT GAME

(By Donald Lambro)

Democratic Gov. L. Douglas Wilder of Virginia thinks his party might have more success in future presidential elections if it begins emulating his common-sense, largely conservative approach to government.

While his gubernatorial colleagues to the north in New York, New Jersey, Connecticut and Massachusetts are sharply raising taxes to dig themselves out from under a mountain of budget deficits, Mr. Wilder is cutting spending, holding the line on taxes and concentrating on stimulating Virginia's economy.

He dealt with a $1 billion budget shortfall this year by asking the state to tighten its belt, instituting across-the-board cuts in spending, and calling on his state's public colleges and universities to hold down their costs and tuitions. In addition, he eliminated the sales tax on non-prescription drugs (he hopes eventually to erase the sales tax on food), created a $200 million rainy-day fund, opposed the creation of new government programs and fought for the death penalty for drug crimes.

Since his inauguration as the nation's first black elected governor, Mr. Wilder has been eloquently lecturing his party to abandon its old time "tax and spend" religion and champion "mainstream values" instead. He sees economic expansion and prudent fiscal policies to encourage such growth as the path to future Democratic victories at the state and national levels.

His growing popularity on the speaking circuit suggests that there are a lot of Democrats around the country who like what he's selling.

"Lots of times people think that the only way you can do better is to spend more," he told me during a wide-ranging interview in his office in the state capital. "Sometimes you aren't required to spend any more than you have spent, or can spend less."

Instead of more public spending to help the needy, Mr. Wilder emphasizes the importance of political and economic empowerment and the upward mobility that comes from increased economic growth.

While some of his colleagues look to Washington and more federal involvement in the problems of the states, the governor thinks the states must look to themselves for their own economic prosperity.

"We've got to be involved in economic development, period," he told me. "I consider that to be one of the greatest social equalizers."

Mr. Wilder thinks that the nation's political center of gravity has been dispersed from Washington to the state capitals. And with that shift "has come additional responsibilities for funding resources and revenues," he said. "You can't rely on any funding mechanisms but your own to attract and bring businesses into the states."

Like many of his fellow governors, he plans to travel "rather extensively next year throughout Western and Eastern Europe and the Pacific Rim nations in search of new investment and increased trade for his state. Despite a sluggish economy overall, Virginia's tight fiscal policies and lower tax rates have attracted some of the nation's biggest corporations. Mr. Wilder is particularly proud of the state's AAA bond rating.

But it is Mr. Wilder's unorthodox political advice to his party, a party in search of an elusive magic formula to make itself relevant again in the national political arena, that makes the most sense of all.

The political fabric of America is largely made up of voters who are "comfortably in the middle" of the political spectrum, he said. "They are not ideologues in any sense, but they want [candidates] who they feel are not threatening, who are not viewed as tax-and-spend politicians. The party must change."

This, while Democrates like New York Gov. Mario Cuomo are preaching that the party's primary purpose must be to stake out and promote a central role for government, Mr. Wilder preaches that the party's central mission must be to guarantee economic opportunity, not results.

"When I was coming up, one of the things my generation wanted was for government to get out of the way—that the government imposed too many restrictions, too many barriers, too many limitations. We were not asking government for anything for us but to remove itself," he said.

Yet in other areas, he is cautious about signing on to new ideas. He is sympathetic with proposals for school choice to help improve inner-city schools, but he is reluctant to embrace the idea until he sees more proof that it can work. Similarly, he expresses some support for Sen. Daniel Patrick Moynihan's proposal to cut Social Security payroll taxes but wants to first see "where the money is going to come from" to offset the revenue loss.

Because Mr. Wilder is unafraid to take on his party's special interests in a bid to win back mainstream Democratic voters, it is little wonder that he is already being mentioned as a possible presidential or vice presidential candidate.

"I'm keeping my options open," he says.

DANGEROUS MOVES AT HHS

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, on June 2, 1987, the U.S. Senate voted 96 to 0 to protect the health of the American people by adding the human immunodeficiency virus to the list of "dangerous contagious diseases" for which an immigrant can be excluded from entry into this Nation.

In 1987, the Senate unanimously approved my AIDS immigration amendment because it was, and is, good public health policy. In fact, I offered by amendment on the recommendation of the then Surgeon General, Dr. Koop, and other officials of the Public Health Service. I agreed with General Koop, as did every one of my colleagues, liberal and conservative, Democrat and Republican, that the public health of this Nation will be at risk if the United States continued to allow immigrants with AIDS into this country.

Incredibly, Mr. President, it has come to my attention that officials at the Department of Health and Human Services are now advocating the removal of the AIDS immigration prohibition as well as the prohibitions now placed on all people with sexually transmitted diseases who attempt to enter this country.

I had assumed that very possible political concession had been made to the AIDS lobby, and to the "homosexual rights" movement which fuels it, but what is now going on at HHS is beyond belief.

Is it not enough that the public health agenda of America has been torn apart by the AIDS movement, and that innocent children—like Ryan White—continue to die because the lobby and its allies promote civil rights rather than public safety? Apparently not, because some in the administration are bowing to the incessant cries of the homosexual rights movement to throw open the floodgates which our sensible immigration restrictions have previously kept shut.

The administration at first attempted to appease the homosexual rights fanatics by creating a special immigration waiver policy. Under this policy people with HIV may enter the country for up to 30 days to attend medical conferences, receive medical treatment, or visit family members. In order to gain this waiver, however, the infected individuals must answer questions about their medical condition, including whether or not they are infected with HIV.

Of course, the homosexuals were not happy—and they will never be until homosexuality is elevated to the civil rights equivalent of race and religion—they cried discrimination. They claimed that America is stigmatizing homosexuals and that everyone should be allowed to come into this country without disclosing his or her medical condition.

At the behest of the President's Commission on AIDS and HHS Secretary Louis Sullivan, legislation was introduced in the House to allow HHS to remove the HIV immigration restriction. In addition, on April 13, the administration issued a special 10-day visa to allow anyone who wants to attend so-called medical conferences, such as the AIDS conference in San Francisco later this year, to come into the country.

That means that foreigners can come into this country for a conference even if they have AIDS but, if they have syphilis, or any of the other dangerous diseases on the prohibited list, they will be kept out. What is the logic in treating HIV differently from other dangerous diseases when the great difference between AIDS and the others is that AIDS kills every time?

Mr. President, the Department of Health and Human Services is not promoting a health agenda. It is promoting an agenda skewed to placate the appetite of a radical and repugnant political movement. Once again the politics of AIDS is given priority over common sense and the public good.

Let's once and for all set the record straight: The Helms amendment, as my colleagues affirmed in 1987, is sound policy. And it works.

In late 1989 the House of Delegates of the American Medical Association made it perfectly clear that the AIDS immigration policy makes medical sense. The AMA resolution said:

> Immigrants have historically undergone a health assessment before admission into the citizenship process. To exclude HIV infection from the health assessment of those seeking U.S. citizenship would be a change in long standing U.S. policy and difficult to justify on medical, scientific, or economic grounds.

Although the delegates opposed mandatory testing of all visitors, it is important to note that the Immigration and Naturalization Service does not require AIDS testing for nonimmigrants. Rather, it asks visitors if they have any of the diseases which are on the list of dangerous contagious diseases.

An article in the August 25, 1989 issue of Morbidity and Mortality Weekly Reports [MMWR], a publication of the Centers for Disease Control, documents cases of HIV-2 infection which have been discovered by public health authorities as a result of the Helms amendment. For the information of Senators, HIV-2, according to the CDC, is rare in the United States, but it is prevalent outside of our borders. In fact the CDC credits the mandatory medical screening process for the detection of the HIV-2 cases. In other words the Helms amendment works.

Mr. President, let no one assume that the AIDS lobbyists will stop here. Each day they grow more strident. Each day they clamor for more special rights and more and more money to be funneled to AIDS programs. There is not a corresponding call for a measured and sensible public health response to this disease.

Congress should put the Department of Health and Human Services, and the AIDS lobby, on notice. The existing immigration law works for the good of all the American people; it must not be treated like a special interest football to be kicked around at the whim of any militant group and its apologists in government. I intend to do everything I can to see that the AIDS immigration prohibition remains in place. If I lose, the American people will lose also.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Morning business is closed.

HATCH ACT REFORM AMENDMENTS OF 1989

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the pending business.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 135) to amend title 5, United States Code, to restore to Federal civilian employees their right to participate voluntarily as private citizens, in the political processes of the Nation, to protect such employees from improper political solicitations, and for other purposes.

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill.

AMENDMENT NO. 1585

(Purpose: To modify the definition of a partisan political office)

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. ROTH] proposes an amendment numbered 1585.

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 3, line 7, strike out all after the comma through "organization" on line 9.

On page 4, line 21, insert before the period the phrase "or hold any office or position within a political party or affiliated organization".

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, this is a very simple, straightforward amendment. It would strike from the bill the ability of Federal employees to hold any office or position within a political party or affiliated organization. If this amendment is approved, it will retain the same law as applies today for this specific issue.

S. 135 would repeal this prohibition and allow Federal employees to hold positions in political parties and affiliated organizations. Proponents ignore the adverse impact of this legislation on the Government and on the American people and focus attention exclusively on the Federal employee. They would have you believe that the Hatch Act oppresses Federal employees and that S. 135 would set them free, when, in fact, the very opposite is the truth. The Hatch Act protects Federal employees from inside and outside coercion. This legislation would, in practice, restrict their freedom.

Mr. President, a similar debate might be held regarding section 603 of title 18, United States Code. That provision, among other things, forbids the staff of the Senate from making campaign contributions to their respective Senators. This provision, it might be argued, robs Senate staffers of the right to contribute to Senate campaigns, a right enjoyed by the entire American populace, except for the oppressed few.

We all know why this provision was passed and has been retained on the books. Section 603 was not enacted to oppress or even to trade employee rights for the honor and privilege of Government service, but to protect the employee. Were it not for section 603 and similar provisions, it might become expected of Senate staffers to make such contributions. Since it is not possible to outlaw expectations, the only way to protect Senate staffers is to prohibit this form of political activity. Similar expectations will arise if Hatch Act protections are removed. It does little to solve the problem to declare against coercion.

After two centuries of trial and error, America and Federal employees have come to appreciate the genius of a politically neutral Federal work force, responsible to an elected President and his political appointees. This system allows Government to be both responsive to popular will, yet fair and impartial in the administration of our laws. This system rests squarely upon the Hatch Act. It is the reason why a politically neutral work force can function subordinate to political appointees without itself becoming politicized.

This legislation is a serious threat to the delicate balance of this much admired system. In his veto message in 1976, President Ford stated that if Hatch Act legislation becomes law, "pressure could be brought to bear on Federal employees in extremely subtle ways, beyond the reach of any anti-coercion statute, so that they would inevitably feel compelled to engage in partisan political activities."

In my opinion, this would be the inevitable result of this legislation. Proponents of this legislation do not seem to appreciate the expectations, the pressure, and the coercion that will spring forth if this legislation is enacted. Few of us would find it appropriate for employees of the Federal Election Commission to be president or treasurer of the Democratic or Republican National Committees at night and then serve as umpires over partisan politics by day. This legislation would allow that. My amendment would prevent it.

Few of us would find it appropriate for an employee of the Internal Revenue Service to be president of the State Democratic or Republican Party organization at night and conducting an audit of a local business by day. This legislation would allow that; my amendment would prevent it.

Few of us would find it appropriate for an assistant U.S. attorney to be chairman of the local Democratic or Republican Party organization at night and prosecuting political corruption during the day. This legislation would allow that. My amendment would prevent it.

These, Mr. President, are but a few examples of what we could expect if this legislation S. 135, is enacted. And what kind of confidence would that inspire in the American people to see these Government officials attempting to administer in a nonpartisan fashion the affairs of government by day and the running of partisan politics at night?

In upholding the constitutionality of the Hatch Act in United Public Workers, CIO versus Mitchell, the Supreme Court considered the question of off-duty political activity. The majority held:

We do not find persuasion in appellant's argument that such activities during free time are not subject to regulation even though admittedly political activities cannot be indulged in during working hours. The influence of political activity by government employees, if evil in its effects on the service, the employees or people dealing with them, is hardly less so because that activity takes place after hours.

This is a very important statement. And this proposed S. 135 attempts to divide or separate political activity by the fact of whether one is on duty or off duty. And, as the Supreme Court points out, I think very succinctly, it makes little difference whether the evil is applied before or after working hours.

So I would hope that my distinguished chairman would listen with great care and be willing to accept this amendment.

In a letter, I point out, to the Governmental Affairs Committee during the 100th Congress, and I think it is just as accurate today as when it was written, the American Bar Association stated:

> We question the existence of such a clear line. The timing of an employee's permissible activity may be clearly defined, but the employee's possible motivation for such activity is not. Will it be any less an evil in the future than it has been in the past for an employee on his or her own time to actively work for the election of a partisan candidate out of a sense of loyalty to his or her superior or out of pressure from that superior, real or perceived? * * * Participating in partisan political activity as a result of pressure from one's bosses at work is a "freedom" which Federal employees can well live without. The bright line of "on-duty" and "off-duty" of S. 135 is a mirage.

Mr. President, I wish to draw an analogy: Suppose that we were at a baseball game and there were 60,000 fans supporting and cheering loudly for the home team. All of a sudden, all of the umpires join in the cheers. Would they be considered impartial?

Proponents of S. 135 would argue, well the umpires would not be able to cheer "on the job."

Suppose the umpires did not cheer "on the job," but afterward, "off the job," they openly displayed their partisan support for the home team. Even if they called every ball and strike and every out perfectly the next game, every baseball fan would begin to doubt their impartiality.

Just like the umpires in this example, Federal employees who became actively involved in partisan politics, whether it is holding office in the national, State, or local Republican or Democratic Party organization or campaigning for a particular candidate in a partisan election, would become identified with a partisan cause. This will fundamentally alter the public's impression of a nonpartisan civil service.

Mr. President, this amendment would keep the current prohibition on Federal employees from holding office in political organizations. It is a straightforward amendment, and I urge its support.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOYNIHAN). The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I would like to respond briefly to the opening comments by my distinguished colleague from Delaware and then comment specifically on the amendment that he has proposed.

Mr. President, I would correct once again—this is several times since this debate started on the Hatch Act—that what S. 135 does in no way repeals the Hatch Act. What it does, it amends and it amends to make it workable.

When I say amends to make it workable, to me that means that you have a stronger Hatch Act, not a weaker one, because what you are doing is taking a very vague act, one in which there have been some 3,000 or more interpretations made through the years, a bill so confusing people do not know what they can do and what they cannot do, and you take that vague type legislation that is subject to misuse, if a person wants to intentionally do something that might otherwise be prohibited, or it also protects against the vagueness of the present law by inadvertent violation. So it protects against those who would intentionally subvert the law for their own purposes or those who would inadvertently, just through the complexity and vagueness and murkiness of this legislation that has developed through the years, would inadvertently violate the Hatch Act.

Just a couple of examples which we have given here on the floor before. If "Hatched," you can wear a campaign button on the job. If you are a Government employee right now, you can wear a campaign button on the job. Fine. And you can write a thousand-dollar check to a candidate if you so desire. But you cannot go down and give any in-kind contribution of your time. You cannot even go in a back room, what we call a boiler room, in a political campaign and stuff envelopes. That would be prohibited. It is right now. You cannot do that. It is illegal. Why on Earth is something like that be illegal? It does not make much sense.

You can do some things but you cannot do others. You can go to a political rally, that is permitted, but you dast not get yourself caught with a sign in your hand. You are violating Federal law if you have a sign in your hand. If you are standing back against the wall and somebody comes along and says, "Hey, I have to go out here and pick my son up. Would you hold my sign just a minute while I am gone?" and you hold a sign as a favor to that person, standing their with a sign in your hand, you are in violation of Federal law. Make no mistake about it. Is that right? That was a political poster at a rally.

But now the change is once you get outside the hall, once you are outside the hall, you can take that same political poster, put it up on your lawn, put 50 of them on your lawn, cover your car with them, do whatever you want to do with them, do anything you want to do with those political posters, but you better not get caught standing in a political rally standing with a sign in your hand or you are in violation. Is it any wonder that people are in doubt about what they can or cannot do?

It does not make much sense. It is things like that we are trying to correct. This is not a monstrous repeal of the Hatch Act. This is now knocking out the protection for Federal workers as though we are about to embark on some effort to get into the spoils system. I submit the Democrats are in pretty bad shape as far as getting into the spoils system. The spoils system would be pretty much under the control of the administration, so the spoils system would go to those who are in power. It is not an attempt to do anything like that.

Let me give another example. If you are "Hatched" if you are a Government employee, you may express your opinion about a candidate publicly but, get this, you cannot make a speech or campaign for or against a candidate. Now, what does this mean, express myself publicly? Do I have to go out in the woods to prevent this—before I say I am in favor of such and such a candidate, or I think you ought to vote a certain way—do I have to go out where nobody will hear me, where the sound reverberating from my voice falls on trees and nothing but? Or can I tell this preference of mine to one person? What is the definition of "public"? How about two people? Am I wrong if I do it with two people. Three is a crowd; four is what? Prohibited? I do not know. I do not know the answer to that. But if "Hatched," it says that you can express your opinion publicly but you cannot make a speech or campaign for or against a candidate.

This one is not all just fun and games either, because in the State of Washington during the last election, Navy shipyard workers were notified that they could not even actively participate in the State's Presidential caucuses. That is a caucus State where you have to go and attend. You do not just go to a voting machine. You have to stay at the caucus or your vote is not counted. You either vote by ballot or in some States by hand; it does not always have to be by ballot. So in the last election, Navy shipyard workers were told they could not go to their Presidential caucuses so they were prevented from having a vote in the primary because they were in a caucus State. Is that right? I do not think it is.

This is one that was here until a short time ago. I thought it was pretty good. This one has been corrected. But until about a year ago, the Hatch Act even extended to the letters to the editor on partisan politics. If "Hatched," you could write one letter to five papers, five letters to one paper, but you could not exceed that. Any wonder that people are a little bit confused about this whole thing?

Well, in the caucus States, to go back to that Washington State example just a minute, and the same thing applies, to some extent, in two shipyards up in the State of Maine that our distinguished majority leader pointed out in his opening remarks on the Hatch Act, where two shipyards, one which is a Government shipyard, the other is a privately owned shipyard. In one, the workers can participate fully, and the other they cannot at all. Does that make sense? They are doing similar work, all Government work, one is private, one is under Government direct employment.

Mr. President, that is what the bill is trying to correct. Nothing more, nothing less.

There is no attempt being made, no matter how many times I have to correct it, there is no attempt being made to repeal the Hatch Act, which I keep hearing over and over again. The bill amends the Hatch Act to make it workable, to give better protection. In fact, some things we restrict are not restricted now. If you are a Federal employee you could go to work this morning with a political button on. I do not think it says what size. So you could have one a foot across if you wanted to, or a tiny one, whatever size you want but you can wear a political button at work. Under the Hatch Act amendments that we propose here, S. 135, you could not do that. You cannot express yourself on the job.

On the job, you are there to do your Government job without fear or favor. That includes not expressing yourself politically on the job. But off the job, we still say you have some restrictions even off the job. Off the job you cannot do any fundraising, any political fundraising. And off the job, you also cannot run for public elective office yourself if you are a government employee. I think those are two good, solid restrictions to remain on.

What is referred to many times and has been referred to a number of times here on the floor is the House bill that takes those last two protections out. Do not confuse the two bills. Our bill says no politics on the job. Off the job, still no fundraising, no running for political office yourself.

That gets us to the amendment by the distinguished Senator from Delaware. Mr. President, the biggest problem with the amendment I see, offhand, is that it would deny Federal and postal employees the right to even be a party delegate. As a result, I feel it denies employees in certain States the right to even participate in basic party politics.

Let me give an example: The State of Connecticut. In Connecticut nominations for office for President, Congress, Governor, State attorney general, State legislator, and for probate court are all decided by delegates to party conventions. This is the difference between running for office or being just a party delegate. And the question is, should Government workers, or even postal workers, be prohibited from even serving as delegates to party conventions and caucuses? I do not think they should be prevented from that.

My interpretation, at least, of the amendment by the distinguished Senator from Delaware would be that they could not run even as a party delegate to conventions and caucuses—that is not for permanent office in the organization—nor run for public political office. They could not even run as party delegate to conventions and caucuses where nominations are made and decided for the offices that I listed a moment ago.

Mr. President, for that reason, I oppose the amendment by the distinguished Senator from Delaware.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LIEBERMAN). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, in the several days' debate that we have had on the Hatch Act and S. 135, it has been continuously urged by the advocates of this legislation that S. 135 does not represent repeal of the Hatch Act. To the contrary, I have argued and continue to insist that S. 135 takes us 180 degrees around from the direction the law now has us headed.

I would like to read once again, under the current law, section 9(a) of the Hatch Act, which the committee report says is widely regarded as the heart of the act. It reads in pertinent part:

(a) an employee in an executive agency or an employee employed by the Government of the District of Columbia may not—

And I emphasize the word "not."

(2) take an active part in political management or in political campaigns.

The whole purpose of the Hatch Act is to try to strike a balance between the rights of the Federal employee to participate in elections and to protect the rights of the American public who have a right to expect Federal laws will be administered in a neutral, nonpartisan way.

Let me read what S. 135 has to say:

An employee may take an active part in political management or in political campaigns * * *.

That is the very opposite, the very reverse, of what the current Hatch Act provides. My colleague can argue semantics as long as he wants to, but there is no question in the mind of anyone who has read this legislation that the whole purpose is to reverse the Hatch Act.

Not only have I argued this, but a public organization like Common Cause agrees and states that S. 135 represents a repeal and is not just a simple, little change.

As a couple of side remarks, because it really has no direct relevance to my amendment before the Senate, but much has been made about the fact that S. 135 would no longer permit a campaign button to be worn on duty. Currently, it is permitted. For some reason that I frankly cannot understand, this point has been made several times that under S. 135, the proposed legislation, employees could not wear a button. It would seem like the logical reason for underscoring and emphasizing that you want no political activity. Really, in the overall picture, it is a relatively unimportant matter.

Let me point out also a number of times that the point has been made that there are workers in two different shipyards: One privately owned, one Government owned. The one privately owned can campaign, can be involved in partisan politics, even though it may be building a ship for the Government. And those who are working in the shipyard owned by the Government are Hatched. And that is exactly right. There are good reasons for that, because, just let me point out, not only is it true of the right to political activity, but the employees at the Government-owned shipyard have all the other protections that are given Federal employees.

As we well know, there are limitations as to the circumstances as to when a Federal employee can be fired. There are very strict procedures—rights of appeal to Federal employees if he or she is dismissed and if he or she so chooses to use them. The rules that are governing the employment rights of those in the private sector are entirely different. I do not see anybody suggesting that all the rights of the employee in the private sector should be extended to Federal employees or that we should do away with the job protection that is offered in the Government spot.

But the thing that I think is important to understand is that, as I already indicated, the purpose of the Hatch Act is an effort to strike a balance between the needs of the individual and the needs of having our laws administered in a nonpartisan way. This is a balance that has been worked out over a 50-year period. Generally speaking, I think it has wide acceptance, both in Government and outside Government.

As we indicated last week, roughly 70 percent of the Federal employees are either neutral or do not want the Hatch Act changed. They are satisfied with the current law and the way it is being interpreted.

I have talked about the balance. But let me just, once again, for purposes of the record and for those who are listening, point out what employees may now do. As my colleagues listen, I think it is important once more to understand we are trying to protect the basic rights to vote of the employee and to protect the right of the American people, the American public, to nonpartisan administration of the law.

What may an employee do now? One, he can register to vote; and two, he can contribute money to partisan political campaigns; three, express their views in private and in public, though not in a concerted way to elicit support for a candidate or party.

The distinguished chairman, in discussing this point, tried to give an illustration that was it not ridiculous that you could get up under certain circumstances, carry a sign, and under other circumstances you cannot.

What the law is trying to do is draw a line between where the activity is as a private individual and where he or she is trying to act as part of a political campaign. That is exactly what was involved in the case involving the three union leaders. And when it got to the courts, the courts found these individuals, in putting a letter in a union newspaper was not violating the Hatch Act; that the fact it was in a union newspaper meant that it was not part of a concerted, partisan political activity.

Let me go on to some of the other things. Again, an employee, a Federal employee, can attend conventions, rallies, but only as a spectator. He cannot get up and get involved in the leadership or active participation because that is partisan politics.

Five, an employee can run as an independent candidate in certain partisan contests in designated areas with a high concentration of Federal employees; 6, he or she can assist in nonpartisan voter registration drives; 7, campaign for or against political referendum questions; 8, participate as a nonpartisan poll watcher or election judge; 9, wear buttons off duty, or subject to various agency restrictions on duty; and 10, participate in nonpartisan campaigns.

What this new proposed law would do is, of course, one, permit a person to hold office in a political party; two, distribute campaign literature and solicit votes off duty. As I pointed out, it would provide a tremendous political machine for one side or another. As I mentioned last week, all your letter carriers on Sunday would be off duty and would provide the most marvelous organization to get your campaign literature distributed to every house in the district. I do not blame the Democrats for thinking that is a pretty good idea.

The new law would permit the organization of and participation in phone banks off duty; organize and participate in political meetings off duty; publicly endorse candidates and urge others to support them off duty; solicit contributions to the PAC of a Federal employee organization to which both the employee and the donor belong off duty.

A national organization could potentially be structured so that that would be a tremendous boon in soliciting PAC funds.

Again, as I emphasized last week, it is ironic that as soon as we complete action on the Hatch Act, it is my understanding that the majority leader intends to bring up campaign reform. The centerpiece of campaign reform is to limit, if not outright eliminate, PAC's. To the contrary, this week, this day, we are proposing to expand. It seems inconsistent.

But my amendment that we have before us at this moment would prevent a Federal employee from holding office in a political party. As I said, for example, if you are a member of the elections commission, how can you, off hours, in the evenings, on weekends, whenever you are off duty, act as chairman of a political party—and I do not care whether it is Republican or Democrat—act in a highly partisan way and then when you come back to the job, take over the responsibility of administering the election laws presumably in a bipartisan way. If it is a Republican chairman, are the Democrats going to think that Republican chairman can exercise his discretion impartially on duty? The answer is "No." And the same would be true if it were a Democrat.

So again, it makes no sense to me to permit a Federal employee to be a party chairman, and for that reason we have urged that through my amendment we delete the right of any Federal employee to be a chairman of a party, whether it is at the Federal, State, or local level.

A second reason that I might point out is the inconsistencies, the ambiguities, of S. 135. As now written, S. 135 says, yes, one can hold a job of chairman or any other partisan political job. But in a further section, it defines what is meant by a volunteer or political contribution.

A political contribution is defined under the proposed legislation not only to include money or gifts, loans, contracts, promises, but it includes the provision of personal service for any political purpose.

Under this legislation, one cannot direct, solicit, or administer volunteer workers off duty unless they are part of the same employee organization. Anyone who has followed politics knows that to be a chairman, whether it is State, local, or national, one of your great responsibilities is to secure, to direct, to manage volunteer workers, whether it be the simple job of addressing envelopes or something more difficult.

So here we have a proposed law that in one instance says, yes, Mr. Federal Employee, you can be a State chairman or a national chairman, but then in the next provision says when you are a State chairman or national chairman, you cannot solicit volunteer services unless they are members of your employee organization.

So as I have said, this legislation, if it were to be enacted into law, is going to create far more difficulty in interpretation, in rules and regulations, than the current law.

But the most important reason, Mr. President, is the point I made earlier, and that is that the Federal employees and the American public are, indeed, very satisfied with the current arrangement. Yes, there are some complaints, as there are under any law. Yes, there are some regulations that could be clarified and made simpler. But overall, the fact that 70 percent of the Federal employees are netural or opposed on any amendments to the Hatch Act shows that the law now on the books has served the American people and the Federal employees well.

Mr. President, I urge adoption of my amendment, which would delete the right of Federal employees to chair a partisan political organization.

I make a point of order that a quorum is not present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRAHAM). The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, could we spell out what the parliamentary situation is here? As I understand it, any votes scheduled for today would be put off until tomorrow. So I presume we can agree among ourselves here that when our debate is completed upon any one amendment we will go on to the next amendment with votes on all amendments put over until tomorrow.

It would be my intention tomorrow on those that I oppose to move to table those amendments. But I presume the parliamentary situation being what it is I must wait until that time to do that because we would also have time for other people to be involved in the debate tomorrow.

Is that a fair summary?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio is correct. There is not now a formal order establishing the time for the votes tomorrow of those discussed today, but it is certainly within the prerogative of those in the Chamber to set aside various amendments.

Mr. GLENN. Further parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. It is my understanding that debate can continue tomorrow on any of these amendments that we are debating today even though they are set aside today for voting tomorrow.

Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. GLENN. I thank the Chair.

Mr. ROTH. If the distinguished chairman will take a question, I would be happy, at least on this amendment, to cut off debate at practically any time now, but I advise the distinguished chairman that I want to have a rollcall vote unless the distinguished chairman is willing to accept my amendment.

Mr. GLENN. I guess that guarantees a rollcall vote.

I do not propose to speak long on this. I had a couple of remarks, and then, as far as I am concerned, we can move on to the next amendment.

Mr. President, I think very basic to this full discussion over these amendments to the Hatch Act is the fact that Americans should be restricted only where necessary. We are talking about the rights of some 3 million Americans when you are talking about civil service and Postal Service. These are, we hope, among the best and brightest in our country. They are the ones we would look to for a lot of leadership at the local level, county and State level. We are not just talking about big national elections here. We have had the situation here in Washington only in terms of what happens during Federal elections, but, remember, probably the bulk of our political activity is done at the city level, even the township level, the county level, and the State level. That is where our political parties are most active on issues that are not Federal issues. If we keep these same restrictions in that are in force now, then we are unduly restricting some of the best people in our country, some 3 million of them, from even participating at that local level. It has nothing to do with Federal elections.

Mr. President, the largest majority of officials of political parties do not hold national office. They represent their parties on a local county or statewide basis. They are far removed from the Federal Government. A Federal employee's status as an officeholder of a local political party would give him or her no special access to power, no special ability to affect Federal policy, nor would it enable him or her to manipulate the job in such a way as to affect public interest adversely.

Mr. President, we have a list here of a little study done by the Congressional Research Service which shows that 41 States have laws, rules, regulations, and interpretations which permit activity off the job. I have seen no huge national cry that these laws are all being abused by the people at the State and the local level.

So I see no reason why we need to knock them completely out of the political process, which this amendment would do.

Mr. President, I repeat only one more time the fact that the example I gave before of the State of Connecticut is a good example of what can happen. Connecticut has a caucus; it is a convention State. In Connecticut, nominations for President, Congress, Governor, State attorney general, State legislature, and probate court are all decided by delegates to the party conventions.

This would prohibit those people from even participating as delegates to conventions and caucuses. I do not think that is necessary. It does not give us additional protection. Any abuse that would come from that is already covered by law as to what they can do and cannot do if they try to coerce. Anyone attending that convention or caucus cannot ask them for money; they cannot ask for contributions. So they are protected there.

I fail to see what the danger is.

Mr. President, I am prepared to end debate on this particular amendment, and set it aside for further debate or a vote tomorrow, and proceed to any other amendments if they are available to be presented.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I indicated last week I would have amendments to the pending legislation. I will offer those amendments in just a few minutes. I first wish to make a preliminary statement.

SET THE RECORD STRAIGHT

Mr. President, I will be submitting two amendments to S. 135 for consideration which I believe, measurably improve the legislation.

However, before I submit these amendments, I would like to take this opportunity to explain why I oppose any significant revision of the standards set forth in the Hatch act as effected by S. 135.

HATCH ACT WORKS AND IS NEEDED

Mr. President, the proponents of S. 135 say that the Hatch Act is no longer needed—that it is a relic of a bygone political era and should be gotten off the books.

Mr. President, I ask why is the Hatch Act no longer needed? It seems to me that the conditions which necessitated its enactment over 50 years ago still exist in one form or another today. Indeed, has politics really changed that much?

The Hatch Act has deep historical roots and was enacted as a much needed and long overdue remedy to years of increasingly gross patronage abuses within the Federal Government, including the administration of Federal programs. And we are hearing some of that even now in HUD, for example.

I have yet to hear anyone on this Senate floor deny that history—including our country's history before the enactment of the Hatch Act—bears countless examples of political abuses that hurt Government, its employees, and most importantly, the people it is supposed to serve.

To say that things are different than they were in 1939 is to ignore the reality of politics, of government administration, and of the employer/employee relationship.

Indeed, the fact that political abuses are comparatively rare in the Federal system, but not uncommon in many State and local government agencies, is a testament to the need and efficacy of the Hatch Act.

You just have to open any national or local newspaper or go ask the Office of Special Counsel, and you will find many examples where improper conduct and political influence have undermined the fair and impartial administration of government—conduct that the Hatch Act prohibits.

While S. 135 also seeks to prohibit certain cases of impermissible conduct, it has moved the line and opened the floodgates by shifting the presumption from one of prohibition to one of acceptance and permissibility.

HATCH ACT DOES NOT OPPRESS FEDERAL EMPLOYEES

Proponents of S. 135 have also claimed that the Hatch Act oppresses Federal workers and deprives them of their first amendment rights. S. 135 has been touted as a civil rights and free speech bill for Federal employees.

Mr. President, such rhetoric only serves to camouflage the real issues and the real impact of this bill.

HATCH ACT PERMITS FEDERAL WORKERS TO ENGAGE IN POLITICAL ACTIVITIES

The Hatch Act prohibits public employees from using their official authority or influence for the purpose of interfering with or affecting the result of an election and from taking an active part in political management or in political campaigns. It does not prohibit such employees from voting, expressing their views in private and in public, attending political conventions or rallies as a spectator, campaigning for or against political referendum questions, and a host of other activities.

These rights are real and they are substantial.

S. 135 WILL LEAD TO POLITICIZATION OF GOVERNMENT

If S. 135 is enacted, visible, partisan activity will become legal. Federal workers will be entitled to hold an office in a political party, solicit political contributions, make speeches and distribute campaign material—to name but a few.

Mr. President, such activities may sound harmless enough, but they are anything but that.

Do we really want a section chief in the Criminal Division of the Justice Department—the individual who decides on the prosecution of public employees—to serve as a party official? Do we want IRS or FBI agents—individuals who have access to sensitive and confidential information—to be soliciting campaign contributions?

These two examples represent only some of the very troubling scenarios that will—not may—but will occur if S. 135 becomes law.

COERCION

Backers of this bill say that Federal employees will only be able to engage in such conduct off duty and therefore their activities will not have an effect in the workplace. This is wishful thinking.

Can somebody tell me what off duty is, how it is going to be policed and who is going to decide whether or not it is off duty or whether taking an extra hour or taking some leave or whatever during the lunch hour? I think it is wishful thinking.

Intimidation and coercion do not have to be intentional; they are subtle, psychological, and all powerful.

Consider the employee who is up for a promotion whose boss is an active party participant during his off duty hours. In such a situation is it not likely that such employee will, at a minimum, automatically believe that he might gain a competitive edge on his colleagues by letting his boss know of his support for the party and perhaps even assist the boss in his nature to believe such political endeavors?

Does S. 135 not create an incentive for the employee to make a contribution to support his boss' political efforts?

In short, Mr. President, looking at the realities of the employer-employee relationship, it is only human nature to believe such things and to take such actions.

Let us just assume we want to have a little drive in our office and we called up staff people and said, "Wouldn't you like to contribute to such and such?" I will bet most would say, "Well, I wish I would have thought of that. Yes, certainly. How much?" That is the same sort of subtle coercion you are going to have if this bill ever becomes law.

As Joseph L. Fisher, chairman of the board of trustees of the National Academy of Public Administration testified in February 1988 before the Senate Subcommittee on Federal Services, Post Office and Civil Service,

Those in the civil service would soon come to believe that better assignments, promotions, and bonuses depend in part on partisan political activity. Equally destructive of morale and motivation would be a growing concern that not being promoted or given a preferred assignment was due to having engaged in political activity for the unsuccessful party or candidate or simply not having participated at all.

So they are going to lose either way.

Mr. President, I am proud that we have a civil service founded on merit, and I believe that S. 135 is a dangerous and ill-advised step backward.

I have reviewed testimony from cases of political abuse in the workplace which have been handled by the Office of Special Counsel—examples of coercion—both obvious and not so obvious—in which employees felt obliged, whether to protect their jobs or advance their careers, to assist their superiors in political campaign activity either by working the phone banks or even, believe it or not, taking out bank loans in order to make substantial campaign contributions.

I fear that if S. 135 becomes law, the stack of cases of political abuse will grow dramatically.

All of this, of course, is bad enough, but it gets even worse when the Senate comes to consider an overhaul of the civil service pay structure to make it fully merit—based. I wonder whether partisan politics, at least to some extent, will come to supplant merit.

BIASED IMPLEMENTATION OF FEDERAL LAWS AND PROGRAMS

I also wonder, Mr. President, if we want to introduce a political element into the implementation of our Federal laws and Federal programs.

In a worst case, S. 135 will lead to abuse in the enforcement of our laws and the administration of programs and the disbursement of funds. This happened before the Hatch Act, and it will happen again without the current protections afforded by the Hatch Act.

In a best case, even if no abuses occur, the public's confidence in the fair and impartial administration of government will be compromised. Every decision made will be suspect and rightfully so.

It is hard enough to maintain public confidence in government without having to argue that politics and party affiliation had nothing to do with the particular action that was taken or the decision that was made.

NO MANDATE FOR CHANGE

Finally, proponents of S. 135 say that this bill implements changes that everyone wants. As with everything else the proponents of this bill have claimed, this is simply not the case.

We have all heard on this floor the many organizations—organizations that have historically taken opposite positions on issues—which are today united in their opposition to this legislation. I have letters here from Common Cause and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce expressing their strong objection to S. 135. Only bad legislation brings such diverse groups together.

I would also like to remind all of my colleagues, as we have already heard, that Federal workers do not want this legislation either.

In fact, I am going to try to put together an amendment that says before it can go into effect in any subdivision like the IRS or something you have to have 51 percent of the workers vote for it. Are we trying to make people accept this, even though they do not want it because some labor leaders are lobbying the Halls of Congress with some success?

WHO SUPPORTS S. 135 AND WHY

So why are we debating S. 135 and who really serves to benefit from the repeal of the Hatch Act?

Some public interest advocates of S. 135 base their support on first amendment grounds for Federal workers. And yet the U.S. Supreme Court has repeatedly upheld the Hatch Act's constitutionality saying that "we see no constitutional objection."

The Federal employee unions support this bill on the basis that those whose interests they represent overwhelmingly support S. 135.

So I think we ought to have a provision which would be germane, which we will offer at a later time, to make certain that the majority wants this extension of the Hatch Act, or repeal of the Hatch Act.

However, as various surveys have indicated, this is simply just not the case.

I believe, Mr. President, as my colleague, Senator ROTH, has so articulately said, that this bill is a simple and obvious means to expand the fundraising activities of the Federal employee unions. S. 135, which prohibits the solicitation of campaign contributions except from fellow union members for PAC's, is an open invitation to the unions to bolster their PAC's bank accounts.

At the same time we are talking about banning PAC's, here on the Senate floor we are taking time so we can make it easier to raise PAC money. I do not understand it. Both Democrats and the Senate bill say we cannot take PAC contributions. In fact, we ban PAC's altogether in the Republican bill. The Democrats' bill, as I understand, says you can still give PAC money to parties and other groups, House candidates, but not Senate candidates. So what we are doing here, the only real purpose of this bill is to make the PAC's fatter, make the PAC's bigger to collect more money, which approximately 88 percent, I might add, goes to members of the other party. And we saw a good example of that just last week when they were talking about Mr. Gould with the Letter Carriers who is doing an outstanding job of raising money and about 90 percent of it went to Democratic candidates.

But you cannot do that now under the Hatch Act, so we are going to take away that prohibition.

Under the Hatch Act, such campaign solicitation by Federal employees is illegal; if S. 135 becomes law, such solicitation would become legal.

This bill amounts to a less-than-subtle means to fatten the Federal unions' and their PAC's pocket books.

As we all know and as I remind my colleagues on this side of the aisle, this money has gone and will continue to go to Democratic candidates even though I assume some of those Members—as I said the other day the letter carriers give about 90-some percent of their money to Democrats. I do not know how much of their mail goes to Democrats.

They deliver the mail to Republicans. They deliver all their money to Democrats. That is one basic difference. And I think they want to deliver more money to Democrats. At the very time we are talking about campaign finance reform we are bringing up a bill that in fact says, Well, there is some kind of hypocrisy going on. We are talking about campaign finance reform eliminating PAC's, what are we doing on the Senate floor? For a week we are trying to make it possible for Federal unions to have bigger PAC's.

So I think the bill flies in the face of the spirit of campaign finance reform. And I would hope that we would keep these things in mind.

Mr. President, I need to be on the House side speaking in about 15 minutes. If I could offer and amend, one amendment, if it is all right with the manager of the other side and he can tell me how good or bad it is while I am gone.

I am going to submit two amendments, but one at a time, which are not going to cure the legislation, but I think might help.

The first amendment is virtually identical to an amendment which Senator BENTSEN cosponsored with me nearly 15 years ago when the topic of Hatch Act reform was before the Senate, except that the scope of this amendment has been expanded to also include employees of the Federal Election Commission. Aside from that, it is just the same as it was 15 years ago.

The amendment passed the Senate by a vote of 68 to 23 and includes the support, among others, of Senators BIDEN, BUMPERS, BYRD, DOMENICI, HATFIELD, HOLLINGS, JOHNSTON, NUNN, PACKWOOD, PELL, ROTH, and STEVENS. Now if their judgment was good 15 years ago, I think it is going to be just as good today.

The amendment I am submitting—that, in fact, I submitted with Senator BENTSEN in 1976—prohibits employees of the Central Intelligence Agency, the CIA, the Internal Revenue Service, the IRS, the Federal Elections Commission, and the Justice Department from giving a political contribution to another employee, a Member of Congress, or an officer of a uniformed service. It also prohibits such employees from requesting and receiving political contributions from any of these persons.

In addition, this amendment prohibits such employees from taking an active part in political management or political campaigns. The restrictions set forth in my admendment are no more limiting than those in effect now for all Federal employees. In fact, the operative language of the amendment carefully tracks language from the Hatch Act as it applies to all Federal workers.

While, as I have stated, I am very concerned that S. 135 will give the green light for partisan political activity to creep into the Federal workplace, I am particularly concerned about the impact that S. 135 would have on agencies handling sensitive or confidential information.

Think of it, the CIA involved in politics. Think of it, the IRS involved in politics. If you were a Democrat who is going to be audited, how would you like to be seated across the table from an auditor wearing a big Bush button.

The FEC—if we ever get around to public financing, which I hope we do not, in campaign finance reform, my colleagues will find out how much influence the FEC can have, and the Justice Department, in civil and criminal investigations. Why should they be involved in partisan political activity on either side?

Active involvement in partisan political activity by CIA, IRS, FEC, and Justice Department employees significantly increases the potential for abuse of privileged and private information about American citizens, not to mention the potential for injecting political considerations into staff promotions and other advancement-related issues.

I fear that given the important, highly sensitive and often controversial matters that employees of these Federal organizations handle, public confidence in the impartial administration of such organizations' business would be substantially undermined and lead to the critical impairment of their ability to effectively serve the American people.

We have already repeatedly heard on the Senate floor of the Justice Department's strong opposition to S. 135.

I also have a letter here from Commissioner Goldberg of the IRS, dated May 4, 1990, which sets forth his many concerns with any bill that would relax the restrictions on political activity set forth in the Hatch Act.

Commissioner Goldberg concludes his letter by saying that "I believe that S. 135 is seriously flawed * * * and I call on the Senate to reconsider its application to employees of the IRS."

I also have a letter, dated May 7, 1990, from Lee-Ann Elliott, Chairman of the Federal Election Commission, in which she states that—

> The perception that commission employees are or may be engaged in partisan political activity, even on their own time, would severely undermine public confidence in our ability to properly and fairly carry out the mandate Congress has given.

Accordingly, Chairman Elliott requests that an exception from S. 135 be created for employees of the FEC.

I think that this Senate has a duty to listen to what the individuals who are responsible for running these very important Government agencies are telling us. They have unequivocally stated that S. 135 will hurt the effective operation of their agencies. That not only hurts the agencies and their employees, it also hurts the American people.

As I said earlier, do we really want CIA, IRS, FEC and Justice Department personnel who have access to sensitive information to feel pressure for political gain to leak such information? Do we really want employees of the FEC—the agency responsible for administering our election laws—to be actively partisan off duty and making supposedly neutral decisions during the day on campaign law issues? Do we really want the American people to have to worry about such things?

AMENDMENT NO. 1586

(Purpose: To provide limitations on the political activities of certain employees of intelligence and law enforcement agencies, and for other purposes)

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending amendment will be set aside and the clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

> The Senator from Kansas [Mr. DOLE] proposes an amendment numbered 1586.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 4, line 4, strike out "An employee" and insert in lieu thereof "(a) Subject to the provisions of subsection (b), an employee".

On page 4, insert between lines 21 and 22 the following new subsection:

"(b)(1) An employee of the Internal Revenue Service, the Department of Justice, the Federal Election Commission, or the Central Intelligence Agency (except one appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate), may not request or receive from, or give to, an employee, a Member of Congress, or an officer of a uniformed service a political contribution.

"(2) No employee of the Internal Revenue Service, the Department of Justice, the Federal Election Commission, or the Central Intelligence Agency (except one appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate), may take an active part in political management or political campaigns.

"(3) For purposes of this subsection, the term 'active part in political management or in a political campaign' means those acts of political management or political campaigning which were prohibited for employees of the competitive service before July 19, 1940, by determinations of the Civil Service Commission under the rules prescribed by the President.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the letters from the Federal Election Commission dated May 7, 1990; the Department of the Treasury dated May 4, 1990; the Office of the Attorney General dated October 18, 1989; the U.S. Chamber of Commerce dated May 4, 1990; and Common Cause dated May 2, 1990, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follow:

FEDERAL ELECTION COMMISSION,
Washington, DC, May 7, 1990.

Hon. ROBERT DOLE,
U.S. Senator, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR DOLE: During your current deliberations regarding amendments to the Hatch Act, the members of the Federal Election Commission wish to express to you our deep concern about the consequences for this agency of proposed legislation revising "Hatch Act" restrictions upon political activity by federal workers. We would respectfully request that an exception be drawn for emloyees of the Federal Election Commission in any legislation intended to liberalize or relax the rules prohibiting federal employees' participation in political campaigns outside the workplace.

Congress established the Commission as a bipartisan body to administer and enforce federal election laws free of partisan or political considerations. Permitting active political involvement by employees of the Commission, even outside the work environment, could only serve to compromise the capacity of the agency's staff to perform their job responsibilities in a non-partisan manner. The perception that Commission employees are or may be engaged in partisan political activity, even on their own time, would severely undermine public confidence in our ability to properly and fairly carry out the mandate Congress has given us.

The members of the Commission certainly have no objections to those provisions of the act meant to strengthen restrictions upon "on the job" behavior related to political activity. Furthermore, we wish to express no opinion as to the appropriateness of the proposed legislation as it may be applied to and impact upon the federal workforce generally.

We hope, however, you will appreciate our strong reservations about those aspects of the legislation that would, absent a special exception, lift the restrictions upon political activity "off the job" by employees of the Commission. We ask your assistance so that our agency will be able to fulfill our particularly sensitive role in the political process with uncompromised impartiality and credibility.

Sincerely,

LEE ANN ELLIOTT,
Chairman.

DEPARTMENT OF THE TREASURY, INTERNAL REVENUE SERVICE,
Washington, DC, May 4, 1990.

Hon. ROBERT DOLE,
Office of the Republican Leader, U.S. Capitol, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR DOLE: It has come to my attention that the Senate intends to vote shortly on S. 135, a bill that will permit civilian Federal employees to participate in the political process. This will include the right to compaign on behalf of partisan political candidates and, in limited circumstances, solicit contributions on behalf of partisan candidates.

I am writing you to express my concern about this proposal as it relates to the integrity of the tax administration system. I am extremely concerned about both the appearance and the reality of IRS employees, such as revenue officers and revenue agents, campaigning and soliciting contributions for candidates of a political party. In my opinion, this could seriously undermine the public confidence in the IRS. Many people would not be able to separate IRS employees' private political activities with their public responsibility to administer the tax laws of this country. While I strongly support the right of employees to express their political views, the nature of their employment with an agency such as the IRS—an agency with tremendous access to sensitive personal information and with substantial powers to enforce the tax laws—circumscribes the extent and manner in which those views can be expressed.

I cannot over-emphasize the importance of this issue to tax administration. Our self-assessment system depends on public trust. The public must have confidence that each Internal Revenue employee upholds the highest standard of professional and ethical conduct. Campaigning for a political candidate would also raise questions of impropriety if the IR employee, while campaigning for a candidate, contacts taxpayers who are currently subject to an audit, collection, or other tax administration matter. In my view, taxpayers would seriously question a law which permits such political activity by IRS employees.

I believe that S. 135 is seriously flawed in this manner and I call on the Senate to reconsider its application to employees of the IRS. Thank you for your attention to this matter.

With kind regards.

Sincerely,

FRED T. GOLDBERG, Jr.

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, DC, October, 18, 1989.

Hon. WILLIAM V. ROTH, Jr.,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR ROTH: This is to inform you of our grave and unequivocal objections to S. 135, a bill that would substantially repeal the Hatch Act. If this bill were presented to the President, his senior advisers would recommend that it be vetoed.

The Hatch Act of 1939 prohibits certain partisan political activities by federal government employees. It was enacted to remedy a century of patronage abuses resulting from the "spoils system." Federal programs to help the poor and the dispossessed were often perverted for political purposes. The Hatch Act seeks to guarantee the integrity of the federal civil service by assuring that federal employees are hired and promoted based upon their qualifications and not their political loyalties. It also assures that federal programs are administered on the basis of need, not politics. The Act's ban on active partisan campaigning by federal employees protects them from coercion and patronage abuse. Those protections remain essential to assure the integrity of the federal work force and the administration of federal programs. They also are critical to the public perception and the confidence in the impartial, even-handed conduct of government business.

S. 135 would fundamentally undermine the Merit System by changing a presumption that partisan politicking by federal servants is prohibited into a presumption that such partisan campaigning is to be encouraged. Specifically, the bill would allow federal employees to hold office in political parties, work in partisan political campaigns, and solicit political contributions from other federal employees, including subordinates, who are members of the same federal employee organization. Such a reversal in the role of partisan politics in the ethic of public service would permit virtually unbridled partisan activities by federal employees, which, history shows, would in turn inevitably lead to the politicization of public administration. For example, S. 135 would permit Internal Revenue Service District Managers to serve as political party officers, loan officers with the Department of Housing and Urban Development could organize partisan compaigns after work, and federal law enforcement officers could make television commercials paid for by political committees on behalf of partisan candidates.

We note that the bill provides that these newly authorized partisan activities are not to be conducted while employees are on duty, wearing the insignia of their offices, or otherwise about the government's business. Unfortunately, these prohibitions would be meaningless. They add nothing to existing criminal prohibitions in this area (see, e.g. Chapter 29 of Title 18 of the U.S. Code, and 18 U.S.C. §§ 641 and 872). Moreover, although proponents claim that S. 135 would provide protections against political coercion, the bill would actually repeal the authority of the Office of Special Counsel, found in 5 U.S.C. § 7325, to seek penalties for Hatch Act violations. Finally, the vestige of the Hatch Act left by S. 135 could be easily circumvented. For example, government officials, who belong to employee organizations, could induce subordinates to join their organizations and then they could extract involuntary political contributions of money or services, as long as this activity occurred during off-duty hours and while the participants were not in government uniforms or on government property.

The inevitable result of S. 135 would be a politicization of the federal work force to the great detriment of federal employees, the programs that these employees administer, and ultimately the public which these programs were enacted to serve. Without the Hatch Act, employees would be inevitably subject to subtle, and not so subtle, pressures to support the partisan agenda in their government offices. It is unreasonable to expect that the few prohibitions listed in S. 135 would have any practical impact on the subtle politicization that would occur in the federal work force. Rank-and-file civil servants would not make federal criminal cases out of supervisors' requests for political contributions or for their off-duty time in support of a candidate. They would find it less costly to be victimized rather than incur the job-related risks that would surely result from a complaint to law enforcement authorities. Moreover, the difficulties inherent in proving even the most patent abuses would render the protections of the criminal justice system illusory. Thinly veiled exploitation and extortion would flourish because the politicized atmosphere of the workplace would make criminal conviction virtually impossible. The resulting impact on federal programs would undermine the public's confidence in the impartial administration of public business.

The Hatch Act ensures an environment wherein federal employees are encouraged to impartially carry out the public's business, rather than being distracted by the demands of political patronage. Under the Hatch Act, promotion is based upon merit, not political loyalty. The Act is understood by the vast majority of federal employees as a bulwark against the political pressures that would inevitably accompany a partisan public work force. Its prohibitions are clearly set forth in the statute and regulations at 5 C.F.R. § 733. The Office of Special Counsel (OSC) is empowered to provide authoritative advice to employees with questions about the application of the statute and regulations to particular circumstances. Last year, OSC processed about 1,400 inquiries from the approximately 3 million federal employees covered by the Act. We believe, on the basis of experience, that most federal employees either understand how the Hatch Act applies or they simply have no desire to politicize their lives and their jobs by engaging in the sort of partisan activity it covers. It is, we think, significant that there has been no groundswell of popular support for this bill from the ranks of federal civil servants.

In sum, the Hatch Act has served to shield federal employees and the programs that they administer from political exploitation and abuse for over fifty years. S. 135, which is being promoted in the Senate as a liberator of federal workers' civil rights, is perceived by many federal workers as stripping them of that shield, and presages that those workers may have to demonstrate a fealty to a political party that they may not otherwise endorse. We are committed to continuing the protections of the Hatch Act and urge you to join us by opposing S. 135.

The Office of Management and Budget has advised that there is no objection to the submission of this report to the Congress and that enactment of S. 135 would not be in accord with the program of the President.

Sincerely,

DICK THORNBURGH,
Attorney General.
CONSTANCE BERRY NEWMAN,
Director, Office of Personnel Management.
MARY F. WIESEMAN,
Office of Special Counsel.

U.S. CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Washington, DC, May 4, 1990.

Hon. ROBERT DOLE,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR DOLE: The U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the world's largest federation of business firms, chambers of commerce, and trade and professional associations, supports the Hatch Act, which protects federal civil service and postal employees from undue political pressure and coercion. The Chamber believes that no law should be enacted to permit solicitation of financial or any other form of support for political candidates, political parties or other political organizations from such employees. The Chamber specifically opposes enactment of S. 135, the Hatch Act Reform Amendments of 1989, now before the Senate.

S. 135 may well undo 50 years of protection of federal workers from political pressure by elected and appointed officials. The purpose of the Hatch Act was to separate this work force from elected leadership. It has protected these workers from exploiting their offices or being exploited by others. It has been a benign barrier to politicizing the federal work force. The Hatch Act has allowed only nonpartisan political involvement by federal employees.

The Chamber knows no compelling reason to amend the Hatch Act. While it is true that there are centain restrictions on federal workers' political involvement, it is also true that they are a unique group of employees. Their job is the efficient operation of the federal government, with equal treatment of all taxpayers regardless of political persuasion.

The U.S. Supreme Court has repeatedly upheld the Hatch Act's constitutionality and in 1973 declared, "it is in the best interest of the country, indeed essential, the federal service should depend on meritorious performance rather than political service. . . ."

The U.S. Senate should act to strengthen government by rejecting S. 135. Federal workers need and want a harassment-free workplace. The Hatch Act was passed to cure the serious problem of political coercion on the federal work force.

Sincerely,

DONALD J. KROES.

COMMON CAUSE,
Washington, DC, May 2, 1990.

DEAR SENATOR: The Senate is soon expected to take action on legislation to amend the Hatch Act which for 50 years has protected federal employees from inappropriate political pressures. Common Cause strongly urges you to oppose S. 135, the Hatch Act Amendments of 1989. This bill seeks to make basic changes in the current Hatch Act restrictions on partisan political activity by federal workers, opening the door to implicit coercion, and abandons the fundamental concept of an unpoliticized civil service.

The House-passed bill, H.R. 20, would repeal Hatch Act protections and for the first time in 50 years allow federal civil service and postal employees to participate in partisan political activity. For example, federal workers could run as candidates in partisan elections, serve as officers of a political party, raise partisan campaign contributions, manage campaigns, and administer political action committees (PACs). The only restraint is that the partisan activity would have to occur during off-hours. Common Cause opposed the passage of H.R. 20.

S. 135 also proposes major changes in the Hatch Act, lifting most restrictions on partisan political activity. Like the House bill, a federal employee would be permitted, among other things, to serve as an officer for a candidate party or a PAC, become a public campaign official for a candidate, and run as a delegate to a national convention. The Senate bill does prohibit federal employees from running for partisan politicial office and from soliciting contributions for partisan candidates. However, it allows government workers to solicit their colleagues for contributions for their own federal employee PACs.

Repeal of the Hatch Act's basic protections, as proposed in S. 135 would increase the potential for widespread abuse and open the way for implicit coercion against which there is no real protection. With basic restrictions on partisan activity repealed, no procedural or other safeguards will be sufficient to protect against subtle forms of political favoritism or coercion of federal workers.

It is important to recognize that under the current Hatch Act, federal workers are already permitted to engage in various political activities. For example, they may make political contributions to candidates, serve as rank-and-file members of political parties, and engage in nonpartisan political activities. It is only the most active levels of partisan participation from which they are currently barred. In drawing this line, we believe that the current Hatch Act strikes an appropriate balance between the federal worker's ability to participate in political activities and the public's right to fair and impartial administration of government.

Common Cause recognizes that the current regulations governing administration of the Hatch Act are complicated. There may be ways to clarify and simplify for workers the degree of participation they are permitted under the Hatch Act without lifting the basic restrictions on partisan activity. We would urge the Senate to instead explore this possibility. As a core principle, however, a careful balance must be struck between an individual's First Amendment right of free speech and association and the public's right to impartial administration of government. We believe S. 135 upsets this balance and would open the possibility of a dangerously politicized civil service.

The Hatch Act was designed to ensure that the federal government is administered in a fair and impartial manner. We agree with the U.S. Supreme Court which stated, in upholding the constitutionality of the Act, that "it is in the best interest of the country, indeed essential, that federal service should depend upon meritorious performance rather than political service. . . . "

Common Cause strongly believe this important integrity-in-government measure should not be repealed. We strongly oppose S. 135 and other proposals that would repeal necessary prohibitions or partisan political activity by federal employees.

Sincerely,

FRED WERTHEIMER,
President.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I did not mean to offer the amendment, but I have a duty to be on the House side to speak at 2:45. I could either set it aside or have the Senator present his argument.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield the floor?

Mr. DOLE. I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I sometimes think people are considering a different piece of legislation here on the floor than the one that has been proposed from the committee and the one we are debating here, because S. 135 is Hatch Act reform. The statement was made that proponents of S. 135 say the Hatch Act is not needed. Nothing could be further from the truth. That just is not a correct statement at all. I feel the Hatch Act is still needed. I certainly am not proposing we do away with the Hatch Act.

What S. 135 does is it calls for fairness. It calls for fairness. It says if Americans do not have to have restrictions put on them for any good purpose then we will keep those restrictions just to what is needed. And what is needed is clarification in the current situation.

The constitutionality was brought up. I never have questioned the constitutionality of the Hatch Act nor has anyone on this side of the aisle as far as I know during this debate.

History, indeed, as the distinguished Senator from Kansas said, does show there have been political abuses in the past. Those political abuses were dealt with by passing the Hatch Act. Back in 1939, the days when the Hatch Act was passed, there were some 300,000 recently appointed employees in a much smaller Government work force and they were flat-out political appointees. There was not any doubt about it. They were expected to work politically. And that is what the Hatch Act was to address. It was to stop abuses such as were occurring then.

What grew up were a number of interpretations in the Hatch Act that came from old civil service law, prior to the Hatch Act even coming in in 1939. It is all those interpretations, and the others that have been made through the years since the Hatch Act was passed, that we are trying to make some sense out of now with this particular legislation.

What we say is, take all these confusing differences of what you can do on the job and what you can do off the job, what you can do publicly, what you cannot do publicly, a whole host of things that has left a situation like this. Those who would intentionally subvert the act to their own particular purposes can find a ruling or interpretation somewhere to do just about what they want to do, probably. On the other hand there are those who would inadvertently violate one of these interpretations of the Hatch Act not even knowing they have done it.

So all we do with this S. 135, it is very simple, we will try to clarify this. We clarify by saying, on the job, you cannot do anything on the job. Even some of the things that are permitted now you cannot do on the job. So that tightens up somewhat on the Hatch Act. Off the job it is a different thing. You should be permitted to participate as much as possible, with some protections still in there, but as much as possible, like any other American.

We still say, off the job, no collection of money, period. You cannot go out and solicit the general public campaign contributions at all, period.

And you cannot run for public office. That is prohibited under this legislation. We keep hearing references to things that I believe are in the House bill, so I hope we are not confusing those on the floor this afternoon.

It was stated that S. 135 seeks a lot of prohibitions. No, it just tries to make some sense out of prohibitions that are in there right now. We do not prohibit employees' right to vote or express public opinion.

Mr. President, the proposal that the Department of Justice, the Internal Revenue Service, the FBI, and the Federal Elections Commission be protected because these jobs are sensitive positions where information gained in line of duty, if you are an employee of one of those agencies, could be used in a way that was never intended to gain campaign contributions.

Mr. President, laws right now prohibit that and prohibit misuse of that information. The Department of Justice is not permitted to use internal information they have developed in their normal line of work to go out and do anything outside, let alone use threats in order to raise money. They, in turn, themselves at the Department of Justice can be locked up if they misuse internal information right now for any purpose outside of a particular case or whatever the information has been developed to do.

It is the same with the IRS. Does anyone think that right now the IRS, with the passage of S. 135, would suddenly be able to use information from your income tax return and come and threaten you with that information or action on that information if you did not make a contribution? The use of IRS information developed internally on the job cannot be used for any purpose outside. Right now, IRS agents can be locked up, as I understand it, if they do misuse that information.

The same with the FBI. They cannot develop information inside and then come out and use it outside for any purpose, whether for campaign contributions or anything else. The same with the Federal Elections Commission. The Federal Elections Commission has written some special prohibitions against that in their own internal administration already, and S. 135 would not change that one iota.

So what are the protections we need for the Department of Justice, IRS, FBI, and FEC? Under penalty of law, they cannot use any of that internal information from any of those agencies or departments for outside purposes right now.

It was asked: Could the boss then use this information to go ask for contributions? And the answer is no; absolutely no. He could not use it for any of those purposes at all, with or without S. 135.

The Civil Service System is, indeed, based on merit, and should be based on merit. There have been violations of that in the past. We know that. The statement was made we did not want partisan politics supplanting merit. I agree with that.

What we do with S. 135 is not change any of the basic protections. What we do is make some sense out of it by saying on the job you cannot do anything politically, period. Nothing. Off the job, you still cannot ask for contributions; you still cannot run for elected political office if you are a Government employee. But why should you then not be permitted anything else, as far as participating in the American political system, like any other citizen?

All this tries to do is clarify the myriad of over 3,000 rules and regulations and interpretations, all of which have been so confusing that they either let those who would subvert the system have a fertile field for operating or those who are within the system sometimes inadvertently making some kind of mistake because they did not understand a certain rule applies. It has been that complicated.

Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Kansas referred to the bill 15 years ago, and I submit that the bill that was being considered 15 years ago is a very different bill than the one we have before us now. At that time, what was proposed was a bill that would have allowed, specifically allowed, Federal employees to solicit money from the general public. That was a far cry from what we are trying to do here today.

I just believe the Senator from Kansas was just not correct in his remarks when he said that if this passes, the IRS could solicit campaign money under the terms of S. 135. They cannot. That just is flat not the case. It does not permit that.

39-059 O-91-13 (Pt. 7)

Mr. President, I agree with my distinguished colleague from Kansas that we need full public confidence in our Federal system. I do not agree that public confidence would be reduced if S. 135 passed. In fact, I think public confidence would be increased, because then we would have on the books legislation that clarifies all these thousands of different interpretations and rulings for the first time.

It makes it a workable bill. It makes it so people cannot deliberately misuse the Hatch Act, nor will they be likely to inadvertently make a mistake under the Hatch Act. So when you clarify things, it seems to me that public confidence is going to be increased, not decreased.

Letters from organizations were mentioned. I appreciate that. There are letters on both sides. At the appropriate time, we will print a number of letters in the RECORD also from a number of organizations who are concerned that we do pass this; they feel it is high time we finally bring some clarity and common sense to the Hatch Act and how it has been administered.

A statement was also made that this would expand fundraising activity that would benefit the PAC's. S. 135 does not really change the ability to raise money or not raise money under the PAC's. We still come under, basically, the same rules. It still says raising money for PAC's, as is provided now, if you are a retired member or elected leader of an organization, you can ask a fellow employee to contribute to that PAC if you are both members of that organization. I do not see that this really changes things that much.

The amendment 15 years ago, it was stated, would be changed in such a way that the Hatch Act would be weakened and would permit the CIA to be involved in politics. Not true. That the IRS could now, if we pass S. 135, be involved in politics. Not true. It does not do that at all; the FEC, Department of Justice, all four organizations—CIA, IRS, FEC, Department of Justice—could be involved in politics if S. 135 passes, and that just is flat not the case.

It was stated they have access to specific and special information, and it could be misused if S. 135 passes. But nothing could be further from the truth than that. Any misuse of information gained in those agencies on the job could not be used against anyone outside for any purpose because that is prohibited under another law right now that has nothing to do with the Hatch Act.

So anyone who is in one of those agencies would be violating other law than the Hatch Act if they ever tried to use any of that information for any other purposes.

Mr. President, for all those reasons, I oppose the amendment by the distinguished Senator from Kansas and suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I would like to make a few additional comments with regard to the statement and the amendment submitted by my distinguished colleague from Kansas, the minority leader in the Senate.

Mr. President, the claim is made that employees should continue to be "Hatched" because they have access to extremely sensitive information and there is the possibility they can misuse it for political purposes; sensitive information that these employees are privy to make them inherently threatening to the general public, and, if you had to say no to them, that would be a little bit difficult.

Mr. President, last year the Governmental Affairs Committee asked the American Law Division of the Congressional Research Service to comment on the issue of agency regulations subsequent to our proposal to reform the Hatch Act. There are several agencies which might merit special attention in the area of allowable political activity and agency missions. Perhaps the most notable example is the Federal Election Commission, which has its own set of separate political rules.

The Congressional Research Service responded to the committee's request with the conclusion that Federal agency rules, even if they reach beyond the provisions of S. 135 and limit first amendment rights, are legitimate if closely drawn within the context of statutory functions and duties of an agency.

Mr. President, that CRS study cited the regulations of the Federal Election Commission as an example of agency regulations which restrict employee political activities even beyond current law, beyond Hatch Act provisions. The regulations of the Federal Election Commission provide, for example, in section 57.11, Political and Organization Activity:

A. Due to the Federal Election Commission's role in the political process, the following restrictions on political activities are required in addition to those imposed by the Hatch Act, 5 U.S. Code 7324:

1. No commissioner or employee should publicly support a candidate, political party, or political committee subject to the jurisdiction of the commission.

No commissioner or employee should work for a candidate, political party, or political committee subject to the jurisdiction of the commission.

Commissioners and employees should be aware that contributing to candidates, political parties, or political committees subject to the jurisdiction of the commission is likely to result in a conflict of interest.

The Central Intelligence Agency, on the other hand—another what one might consider a sensitive agency—has not prescribed any special restrictions of its employees' political rights. Therefore, CIA intelligence employees in sensitive jobs can right now, if they want, wear political buttons on the job, put bumper stickers on their cars, signs in their front yards.

We defeated an amendment in committee to exempt Federal employees who are engaged in intelligence activities from the provisions of S. 135. The vote on that was 8 to 5. This amendment was defeated for several reasons. There are already numerous statutes in titles 5 and 18 of the United States Code which provide criminal and civil penalties for the misuse of classified or confidential information by any Federal employee. They have nothing to do with the Hatch Act or with S. 135, and nothing in S. 135 will affect those prohibitions and those penalties. That is in law now.

Furthermore, I want to point out that the people with the greatest access to sensitive information, the agency heads, the Secretaries of Departments, Presidential appointees confirmed by the Senate, are currently exempt from any Hatch Act restrictions and can participate in political campaigns and fundraising activities fully. That is provided for now. In addition, the identities of CIA and other intelligence employees are closely protected, and it is not reasonable to expect these employees to go around broadcasting their identities when participating in the political process.

We defeated the amendment because S. 135 is a very moderate proposal. S. 135 strictly prohibits all Federal employees from using his or her official influence or authority in this way. For IRS auditors, specifically 26 U.S.C. 7214, provides penalties for anyone who:

• • • demands or accepts or attempts to collect directly or indirectly as payment or gift or otherwise any sum of money or other thing of value except as expressly authorized by law.

The penalties are:

To be dismissed from office or discharged from employment and, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both.

Let us suppose an IRS auditor wants to misuse someone's tax return for political purposes. Again, 18 U.S.C. 1905, 2071, and 5 U.S.C. 552(a) provide criminal and civil penalties for the disclosure of confidential Government information, and 26 U.S.C. 6103 specifically prohibits the disclosure of tax return information.

While that IRS tax auditor can wear a campaign button on the job today, he or she could not wear a political button while working, if S. 135 is enacted into law.

Mr. President, the fact is that 41 State governments now have more liberal Hatch Acts than the Federal Government. Those States collect taxes, and they enforce the law. There are few bits of evidence that those State employees in sensitive positions use their position to influence political activity.

Mr. President, the purpose of S. 135 is to clarify the confusion and the illogic of current law governing the political activities of Federal and postal employees—to make the law fair, to make it workable, make it one where all the confusion surrounding the myraid interpretations no longer exists, by stating very, very clearly what can be done on the job, and what cannot be done on the job, which is, nothing political can be done on the job.

We also clarify what can be done off the job; no fundraising, no running for elective political office.

Mr. President, at the appropriate time tomorrow, when we have votes, I will move to table the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

I withhold that request.

AMENDMENT NO. 1587

(Purpose: To delay the effective date of the act until bans on PAC contributions and soft money are enacted)

Mr. SIMPSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming is recognized.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Ohio. I listened with interest to his remarks and know the sincerity that he brings to the cause in every sense, just as he does with every issue with which he is involved.

In accordance with the unanimous-consent request previously, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the pending amendment is laid aside.

The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. SIMPSON], for himself and Mr. DOLE, proposes an amendment numbered 1587.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 9, after line 5, inset:

(d) In no event shall the amendments made by this Act take effect before the date on which there is enacted into law provisions—

(1) which prohibit contributions or expenditures for the purposes of influencing an election for Federal office by any person other than an individual or political party committee; and

(2) which prohibit contributions or expenditures to be made in connection with an election for Federal office, unless such contributions and expenditures are subject to the source and dollar limits, and the reporting requirements, of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I rise to propose an amendment to S. 135. The bill, of course, would revise and reform the Hatch Act. I did not use the word "repeal." I understand that has a very negative connotation to the sponsor. Therefore, revisions and reform I believe is the appropriate phrase.

I offer this amendment out of great concern for the bill, which is really in dire need of amending, more so, I should say, than is the Hatch Act itself. In this "frenzied rush"—and of course I have heard that term used especially on immigration reform. We had not done anything for 35 years but they said it was a "frenzied rush to judgment." This is a frenzied rush to judgment after 50 years of a law being on the books.

But, in this rush to reform, and revise this 51-year-old Hatch Act, we have heard any number of justifications for passing this bill. But when you get right down to it, of all of these various and sundry reasons, they can really be all boiled down into two. The first being the allegation that the Hatch Act represents an abridgment of first amendment rights. That has a real ring to it. The second being that the Hatch Act is too confusing and, must be simplified.

I will grant some proponents of S. 135 this much—there certainly is some confusion about the Hatch Act. I would say that those who are crying "first amendment" on this one are either confused themselves or are surely trying to confuse others, because the Hatch Act does not abridge the freedom of political expression of any Government employee, nor does it abridge any other first amendment right. But that opinion does not originate with me. It is the judgment of the U.S. Supreme Court which for over half a century now has declined to strike down the act. On two occasions they ruled that the act was constitutional, even that it was necessary—more than constitutional; it was necessary.

In 1947 in United Public Workers versus Mitchell, and in 1973 in U.S. Civil Service Commission versus Letter Carriers, those were the cases.

Let me quote one sentence from one of those decisions:

It is in the best interest of the country, indeed essential, that Federal service should depend upon meritorious performance rather than political service.

I ask my colleagues to think about that for a moment. During that period of great leaps forward in all facets of the first amendment protection, our very highest court in the land saw fit to leave the Hatch Act untouched, untrammeled.

So we are left with a rather astounding claim now by those who call the act an abridgment of first amendment rights that somehow the Warren court, which was probably more attentive to so many rights of our citizens in those years, would not even take up a case challenging this act—and they would not—was unable to discern all of these ways in which the Hatch Act infringed upon basic democratic freedoms, and it is thus up to the 101st Congress to now correct them.

Now, come on. That certainly sounds confused to me. It prompts the question as to where that confusion is coming from. But it is out there, no question about it. Some certainly feel that they have a pretty big stake in spreading it around.

I know there are folks out there who think they are not permitted to participate in the political process, and that the sole reason for that is the Hatch Act. The Hatch Act is to blame. I meet with them all the time. Postal workers, for example, come to my office to say, "Senator, boy we want to get involved in our great political system, but because of the Hatch Act we cannot." That is what they have been told by somebody. That is what they believe. That is pretty sad.

So I have a standard response to that. I ask them just what it is they would like to do that they believe they cannot do. I have then a list always ready of activities which are permitted under the Hatch Act.

After I finish telling them that they are permitted to be politically active in the manner in which they mentioned, I then read the rest of the list. Here is what they can do. They can register and vote; they can register voters; they can express political opinions; they can participate in political campaigns where none of the candidates represent a political party; they can contribute money to political organizations; they can attend political fundraisers; they can wear political badges and buttons and display political stickers; they can attend political rallies and meetings, join political clubs and parties, sign nominating petitions, and campaign regarding referendum questions, constitutional amendments, and municipal ordinances.

Do you know what they do after I read them that list? They look at me with astonishment and say, "we can do all those things?" That is the invariable reply. And the answer is," yes, they can, and a lot more" There certainly has been ample political participation by civil servants during this particular debate. I can tell you that. Do not go out in the hall; you will get your shoes ripped off during the debate. There they are just lined out across this expanse into the next marvelous piece of public ground. They are in it hip deep.

So I read them the list, and they listen and there certainly has been a unique and remarkable amount of political participation by civil servants during this particualr debate. Is anybody missing that? How curious this is. That is what is allowed under current law. That is just the way it should be. When we go through this phalanx as we leave our Chamber, there they are, the citizens petitioning their Government. That is perfect, and that is the way it is, and I like that.

Last Wednesday the Washington Post ran a story about the National Association of Letter Carriers contributing $769,000 to political efforts last year. It does not sound to me like any poor souls are being excluded from the political process by the Hatch Act.

So the issue here is not political participation or the first amendment or freedom of expression. It never has been, my colleagues. The issue is coercion. That is the issue. There is no other issue. The others are just a tissue of things tacked together to give it a good old taste.

The issue is coercion. Coercion of Government employees to perform political activity, to be quite specific. We tend to forget that, because we have not had to worry about it since the Hatch Act was passed. But at one time, Mr. President, we sure did have to worry about it, and that is why the act was passed.

Years ago, my dear father was elected Governor of Wyoming, and he served here in the U.S. Senate, and I remember that campaign so distinctly. I referred to it a bit in previous debate. The minions of his party, Republican, went through the parking lots of the State Capitol to be sure that they had observed who had ripped off the bumper sticker of the opposing candidate. Who had been involved? Who had given a dollar or $5 to the campaign?

I remember one of the Republican faith coming up to him, one of his political allies that helped him get elected, and he had a list in his hand, and he was trembling with anticipation and glee, and he said, "Here is the list of those people who ought to be sent packing." My father asked why they should be dismissed, if they had been there 20 or 30 years and they were good workers. Why should that be? I know that is an unheard of thing for a politician to say. He was told simply that even though they were darn good workers, and some of them had received many awards, they had been on the other side. That is all. It did not matter one whit how good they had been or how poor they had been; they were on the other side.

I am proud to say that my father refused to take any part in that game. He was later defeated as he ran for reelection. Part of it, I am sure, was that he did not favor the death penalty, which is a pretty hazardous place to be when you represent the State of Wyoming. But you better believe that plenty others were ready to play that game, even though he was not, and the game was played. They rolled them out of that State capitol in spades. Before the Hatch Act was passed, that was the way the game was played. It is called coercion. There is no other fancy or less fancy name for it.

So these folks who come to see me, who are worried about political expression, the first amendment—and I commend them for seeking full participation—should also be really thinking of one other thing. They should be plenty worried about their jobs. They should not really worry about this and what they are doing up here redressing and petitioning their Government. They ought to worry about their jobs, if this bill becomes law, because some very mysterious and subtle little things will happen.

It does not matter how you outline coercion in this bill, and I have read that. It is a nice idea, a thoughtful idea. It should not give anybody too much pleasure that it will work, because it will not work. These mysterious things will start happening to these people when we make these changes in the Hatch Act.

They might not be told in any sense that they must solicit political contributions come election time. They will not be told that. I suppose they will sign papers and do all sorts of remarkable things to assure that. But those that do solicit political contributions at election time, off duty, and score up their little list and hustle on down to their superviser with it, and then they will get their brownie points. I can tell you that those that do this are going to start getting some remarkable assignments, which are a little bit more desirable, and they are going to get promoted a little bit more swiftly. The rest of them are going to get a little smaller office, the worst assignments, no window on the Mall.

That was a nice office you had, perhaps, but no more. There will always be some other reason for it. Always. Like poor old Fred, he just does not work as hard any more as he did. Or he is not a team player. Or, gosh, he lost his zip. Or he is not willing to go the extra mile. Or, gee, he was one of my favorites, but I do not know, he is just not like he used to be. That is the sort of thing we will hear, and it will seem perfectly reasonable and perfectly legal.

Mr. President, I am not conjecturing. I am stating that that is exactly what did happen before we passed the Hatch Act to protect our Government employees. Lobbyists for Hatch Act reform believe that times have changed. We have heard that ringing comment. Times have changed, and protection from such abuses is no longer necessary, thank heaven, in this enlightened age. Well, times have changed, but human beings have not. The ones that have really not changed and have increased in intensity are partisan pinheaded people that you and I know all over the United States.

Times have changed, but only because our institutions have changed as a result of the Hatch Act. Human nature has not changed. There are some very small-minded politicians, pinheaded yahoos, small-minded Democrats and small-minded Republicans. Weasel-like political people will take the latitude, and they will run with it. And it will be the latitude that we will give them in this legislation, and they will use it, and they will abuse it like a large club with a nail right in the end of it. They will use if for raw political purposes, at the expense of some pretty fine public servants.

Look at some of the polling being done now. I think it will help us when we get to the sustaining of the veto. When we pick up about three or more votes, and we will be able to give this one a burial at sea. The real sincere public official does not want this at all. Seventy percent, sixty-five, pick your poll. They do not want this change.

Who does?

Well, you have seen them right out here in the wall. Their eyes are kind of glazed over and they are raring to go, cannot wait to get into the saddle and ride right on into the night. They are going to use it and they are going to abuse it. Humans are remarkable creatures, but they are no closer to moral perfection in politics and whacking on the other side of the aisle, especially in public employment, than they were 100 years ago when the abuses came which necessitated the Hatch Act and put it on the books. The abuses lasted for 45 years and they were appalling. The people of America were appalled by the those abuses.

There are a few postal employees, I am certain, who chose not to contribute to the $769,000 pot which the National Association of Letter Carriers collected last year, and they did not have to think twice about it when they did not kick into the pot. But under S. 135 workers would be allowed to ask fellow union members for campaign contributions to political action committees, to PAC's, off duty. Of course, no one would dare do that by the watercooler. We know, of course, they would not, purity being what it is, pure as the water in the cooler. When your boss mentions at a weekend picnic that you might want to contribute some money to his favorite PAC, it does get your attention, I think, without threat. Just its mention. Surely, you cannot believe that that will not happen.

Who does not know that the $769,000 pot is going to get a lot bigger under that system? That will be the pot at the end of the rainbow, and it will be filled. Out in the private sector it sure happens, too. Let us not leave that out. Certainly it does happen. There is no getting around it.

Businesses do take political stances and enlist the support of their employees. And who is to say whether some of that support is not very reluctantly given out of a belief that it is better to be safe than sorry? But when this starts happening in government, it is an abosolutely intolerable situation. When it happens in business, it is bad enough. But when it happens in government, it is absolutely intolerable.

We can argue about how political leanings to various corporations may tangentially impact the general citizenry. But the citizen's right to impartial administration of government is absolute. The Internal Revenue Service and the Post Office, for example, are there to serve all of us in the population with a "D" behind our names, or an "R" behind our names or a "I" behind our names. And every citizen must believe that governmnet employees are absolutely neutral in the performance of their duties. That is not some novel principle. We can all relate to that.

The man or woman who goes in for an IRS audit should not be met by some fellow sitting behind the desk wearing a Dukakis button or a Bush button or a Simpson button, either. It is not the first amendment at stake, and it is not being able to participate in your government. It is called coercion by small-minded people. No amount of integrity displayed by that person is going to be able to overcome the appearance of bias, plain old political bias. I think all of us ought to be very concerned about that.

So that leaves me wondering what possible reason there could be for passing S. 135 this time. Those who know the Hatch Act know that is constitutional and, therefore, does not violate first amendment rights in any way. But, boy, we have had that pumped in our head now for the last few years.

The spoils system reigned in this country, in American politics, before institutional changes such as the Hatch Act were put in place. It redressed some of the excesses and unfortunate chapters in our history—like Tammany Hall, rule or ruin. That is why the Hatch Act came about.

The Hatch Act has been indispensable in insuring that government functions are administered in a very fair, unbiased, nonpartisan, and impartial manner. What possible purpose other than election year politics could such a remarkable revision and reformation come upon us in these enlightened times? Pressure—Pressure with a capital P, that is what this is, nothing more, not one shred more. The possibility that PAC's are going to go down the tube and the hypocrisy of ringing up the scorecard on this side is what this is all about.

Well, let us be honest in the debate. Let us talk about pressure, plain, old political pressure. As to a lot of these Federal unions, the employees are right here, they all live here—they are in the District of Columbia, they are in Virginia, they are in Maryland and they can clog up the place in minutes. They are good at their craft. Pressure, political pressure with a 1990 election year twist. Is this election year politics? Sure. What else?

It did not come up in 1989; it did not come up in 1981; I do not remember it in 1983. I have been here 12 years. It just lies there until election year.

So repeal of the Hatch Act—and we will not call it that, we will call it reform and revision of the Hatch Act—along the lines of S. 135 would enable Federal employee union members to solicit campaign contributions from one another. That is what this says and they most assuredly will and, as I say, that little, old pile of $769,000 collected last year is going to swell and grow and we know perfectly well where it is going to go.

Now we get into the realities of a little touch of partisanship here. The political action committee contributions from the American Federation of Government Employees, the American Postal Workers Union, the National Association of Letter Carriers, the National Rural Letter Carriers, the National Treasury Union Employees, the National Association of Postal Supervisors, the National Association of Postmasters, the National League of Postmasters—and get this, the postmasters have two organizations. Do not ask me why. I guess one wants more than the other one. I do not know. But there is some reason. There must have been a falling out there.

When taken in combination, those groups I have just described have expressed mailed 88.1 percent of their moneys to the Democrats in the years 1987 and 1988. Now we can get down to some silly old facts here. I hate to do that, but I think we ought to, which, to tell the truth, was a more evenhanded distribution in 1985 and 1986 when 92.2 percent of the moneys went to Democrats. Now that is what this bill is about.

And they do have a unique way of giving to Republicans every once in a while, but only if the Republican is so far ahead you could not catch him with a freight. Then they give money, 2,000 or 4,000 or 5,000 bucks to any poor wandering Republican who is in the polls up 75 to 25 percent.

That is the way they play their game. That is not news to anybody here. The actual figures might be, but the qualitative truth of that is well known to us all.

If we give the go ahead to those who seek to lean on our civil servants to contribute to these PAC's, we are going to fatten considerably the coffers of the Democratic Party. I assure you that the Republicans will be treated like poor relatives, in spades.

So I hope we do not have to hear too much more about patriotism and good government being the primary motivator. I just shared with you the figures and these are the heavy hitters. They are the persons who are at the town meetings. The irony of it is, if the bill becomes law some of those are going to lose their job because they were not pure enough or in tune enough. They were just doing their work; they did not dream somebody so small minded could give them the old deep 6, but they are going to learn that. Those are some things I want to share with you.

You know we should not attribute 100 percent of the zeal which so many have to reform the Hatch Act to the political profit which the Democratic Party stands to reap for the enactment of this bill but we should not shy away from the facts either. The impact on the upcoming elections will be very real and it will be sizable. Whether intended or not this is a bill with awesome political ramifications and the most awesome ones are against the party that I am proud to be a member of for all of my political life.

Now there is a substantial motivation for the Democratic Party to be off and running right now, to be seeking at this time all of the help they can get.

There is a reason. For the first time in generations, a plurality of Americans have identified themselves as Republicans—48 percent, according to the figures released in March, as opposed to 43 percent calling themselves Democrats; 41 percent of Americans now identify the Republican Party as the party most able to deal with problems facing the United States as opposed to 29 percent naming the Democrats.

That is undoubtedly of rich and serious concern to many in the Democratic Party, as it would be to anyone in that situation. I am certain that they would welcome the additional influx of funds that would be the result of passing this legislation. Who would not?

I do hope my colleagues on both sides hear me out on the matter because those facts do represent and present a problem to this legislative body. Here we are in the midst of a great debate about another great issue, campaign finance reform. That is the next locomotive on the track. We have election ethics legislation before us which will establish spending limits on Senate election campaigns, prohibit PAC contributions to Senate candidates, ban the use of soft money which is now being referred to as sewer money. I am helping to do that.

I am a beneficiary of PAC's. It is an election year for me and, I presently get my share of PAC contributions, but they are connected with Wyoming; they are connected with oil and gas and mining and industry and agriculture. But I have a hunch that we are going to get rid of PAC's this year, at least in the Senate. I do not know if the House would ever unleash itself from a dependency on PAC's. But I have a hunch that when the heat comes on from the American public, they are really going to begin to scratch and claw, because they are a pervasive influence and they have lost their way. PAC's have lost their way. They use to make contributions to support somebody with ideologically shared views. Now they just give to anybody who is an incumbent regardless of how they vote.

We ought to help them find their way. We will just close off the exit from the woods, because they are lost in there. So we will cut them off. We will get rid of soft money and phone banks that get cranked up on the edge of towns to whack it on the old Republicans. We will have some fun with that.

So, here we go. We are going to deal with contributions for activities which affect Federal elections and undercut negative campaign advertising. We are going to talk about the cost of campaigns. That is coming up next week, our leader tells us. We are probably going to delay the effective date of campaign finance legislation because we do not want to do anything here which will unduly affect the election immediately coming up. In fact, some of the horror stories I am grasping from those on the other side of the aisle go like this: "Good lord, can't we set that back until 1994 or 1992? Get the heat off of me. I don't want to get ground up in that process."

So that is fine. We'll set that up for 1992 or 1994, but we'll do the heavy lifting this year. I think we are going to get that done. There is nothing wrong with that. But when people look at this vote on campaign ethics, we do not want them to be able to say we were inappropriately influenced by our own reelection prospects when we were drawing it up. And that is what this legislation does.

For the same reasons, we cannot in good conscience implement any sweeping revision of the Hatch Act under these same circumstances. I personally doubt the necessity of passing S. 135 at all, obviously, but there is no way you can honestly pass this now and implement it, and leave campaign finance reform to take effect later on. The public is going to see right through that one. That is a total inconsistency. Here we are working on this legislation to eliminate PAC's, at some date after these elections. At the same time we are getting ready to pass this bill which is going to fatten up one party's PAC contributions just in time for the same elections. There is one thing the American people understand; it is called fairness. There ain't nothing fair in that game at all.

This body cannot even approach the appearance of sincerity and openness and candidness on that basis. The public is going to ask us why we felt it was necessary to give those PAC's a big boost in the rear right now, leaving their legislative death to take place in the future. Come on.

I would like to quote from a speech given in this Chamber by our present distinguished Republican leader back in 1976 when he carried our banner. In it, Senator BOB DOLE warned of the danger of implementing a > • • • drastic alteration of long-established principles in the midst of a campaign period, and only months before a major national election takes place. At best, a good deal of confusion would result among Federal employees regarding permissible political activities. At worst, serious violations of prohibited campaign activity would occur on a wide scale, endangering the careers of Federal employees and the outcome of some elections. It is important that congressional approval of this bill neither now or later be construed as having an inappropriate impact upon the November 1976 elections.

The Republican leader was as persuasive in his oral arguments then as he always is now. He was absolutely right in questioning the propriety of taking such drastic action in the midst of a campaign season. The real pro does not want a thing to do with this. The real guy who does his work for this Federal Government—and we do bash them, we all bash them, the bureaucrats, but I notice that we are willingly with them most of the day talking about things with our constituents, striving to see if we cannot get something done, whether we are dealing with the Interior Department or Justice or Energy. The real pro who works here in Washington and out in region 8 or region 4 does not want this bill. He or she does not want to see those goofy 100 percent partisan people wander into his shop and mess him up. He does not want that. She does not want that. That is just exactly what they are going to get. They are going to get it in spades.

For similar reasons I am introducing this amendment which will delay the effective date of this legislation until the reforms regarding PAC's and soft money, sewer money, which we expect to pass as part of campaign reform take effect. I think that S. 135—whatever you call it, revision, reform, not repeal, enlightenment—is a very, very bad idea and will result in no end of mischief, just plain mischief. And that will be the lightest word that applies.

It is going to result in the destruction of careers, of people who suddenly, for no reason—mind you, there will never be any fingerprints on these activities—fall along the wayside. All because they just did not quite do it like they should.

Well, I hope that the proponents of the measure would at least pursue a consistent policy of not taking action which will directly influence the outcome of the coming elections. Because that is what this will do; boy, will it.

It is the fair and the right thing to do. It will enhance the credibility of this body in our efforts to straighten out the campaign ethics laws. I ask my colleagues to give full consideration to these concerns, and I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio is recognized.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, my distinguished colleague from Wyoming talks about "Let us deal with the facts." And that is exactly what I want to do. Because the facts are that it does not materially affect the fundraising capability in any way for political action committees.

My distinguished colleague and I talked briefly here on the floor the other day about what this act really provides. The facts are that the ability to collect money under S. 135 is not changed one bit from current law. We do not change that.

He may be referring to the House bill. This is not the House bill. This bill prohibits any Federal employee still from running for a political office per se, and it specifically prohibits asking for contributions or soliciting contributions from the general public.

The facts are that this does not change the ability of PAC's to raise money at all. All this great wave of money that was put forward here—that if we have $796,000, oh boy, just wait and see what comes up after this passes—that money was raised under current law, and S. 135 does not address that at all except to say that whatever law benefits whoever right now continues in effect right now. So that does not change.

It does not change for the Chamber of Commerce or the unions; it does not change for anybody they may choose to give their money out of those multicandidate PAC's.

A great thing was made about the Government employees' unions that contributed the percentages they contributed to Democrats and Republicans and how, if you like that, just wait until you see what happens under

S. 135. Well, S. 135 does not change that.

Mr. President, I, too, want to see campaign reform. I want to see it very much. We are putting together those campaign packages on both sides of the aisle and, as I understand it, in just a few days when we dispose of this particular legislation, we will then be considering what limitations we want to make on campaigns: campaign finance reform, ethics reform, and whatever.

At that time we will deal with the soft money and whether PAC's will be voted out, whether there will be limitations placed on them. But that is not addressed with S. 135, and we are mixing apples and oranges here. We are mixing two different things.

My distinguished colleague says this is a frenzied rush. What has happened is we have had hearings for several years on this. Every time it came up in hearings, we heard all these horror stories about how there were so many interpretations of the Hatch Act and the rules and regulations under it that nobody could make sense out of it, so people really did not know, sometimes, whether they were violating a particular interpretation or not.

And, on the other hand, those who had wished to interpret for their own nefarious purposes in a particular direction could find some way to do it.

So we asked OPM to clarify these things. They could have done it if they had wanted to. They have had several years, and nothing has happened.

So we finally decided to take this very modest action that we had taken in S. 135. Some of the dire consequences my friend from Wyoming points out in this, I do not know where those things come from. But they are in no way intended, nor will they happen, as I see it, under S. 135. Particularly, if S. 135 passed, he implied, we would go back to the spoils system. In an election year, this was a political measure only. There was pressure with a capital "P" that would be exerted to raise all this money.

This does not change the ability to raise money. This does not alter it, and no amount of saying that it does will change the facts.

We do not change the PAC law that says PAC's are legal, and we do not change the fact that certain persons within a PAC can ask other persons in that same organization for a contribution to that PAC. But they cannot go outside. They cannot go to the public and put the pressure on them for a contribution. That is just not what S. 135 does. So I think there is a great deal of misunderstanding here about what S. 135 does.

The issue of constitutionality keeps coming up. I never questioned that, nor does anyone that I know of, and nothing in S. 135 addresses the constitutionality or tries to change that one bit. So that is a straw man, as far as I am concerned. I do not know why that keeps coming up, for speaker after speaker here on the floor, that we set up this constitutional thing and how we are trying to change that with S. 135. That is just not the case. We do not adress that at all.

The Court has ruled that the Hatch Act is legal. I agree with that, and agree with the Court 100 percent. We are not trying to change that. Constitutionality is not at issue here at all.

What has been at issue is that we have had a very confusing Hatch Act. The Hatch Act is supposed to back up the civil service merit system, and that is exactly what we want it to do. We hoped we could work out some of these conflicting differences in the interpretation of the Hatch Act, but that does not seem to have been the case. So we are addressing it with S. 135, this legislation.

The issue, we are told, is coercion, so that Government employees can go out and be political hatchet men of some kind. And I firmly admire the father of our distinguished minority floor leader in that he would not go along with some of those things being proposed. But the statement then is made that people are going to have to worry about their jobs if S. 135 passes; that some mysterious thing will happen, that there will be forced contributions.

I do not really know where that comes from because nothing in S. 135 changes the ability of anybody to make forced contributions. In fact, we continue those prohibitions against going out and leaning on anyone in the public. The only thing that is permitted is if you are a member of PAC, you can ask somebody else for a contribution to the PAC. That is just people inside the same organization.

It does not change the PAC's ability to raise funds, and that does not change for the chamber of commerce or any of the national business associations. It does not change for the labor unions. It does not change for anybody. That is the way the PAC's run right now, and we are going to have legislation, as my colleague says, on the floor shortly to address that. We will debate the limitations on PAC's at that time, and properly so. I expect to be active in that debate.

So, you cannot make these forced contributions. No one, if we pass S. 135, will be given additional authority to go out and push for contributions from anybody that all PAC's are not free to solicit contributions from right now.

I repeat once again, I think there is a great deal of confusion between what the House has passed, where they specifically permit political contributions to be solicited, and where they specifically permit people to run for public political office. We do not do that in this bill. So let us debate S. 135 and not the House bill.

My colleague said we have had 51 years of the Hatch Act, and that is correct. It has served us well. We passed it in 1939 at a time of great need. There was a spoils system before that. Everyone recognizes that, admits to it, and the Hatch Act was supposed to correct that.

What happened through the years? A lot of the things were rolled into the Hatch Act from the old civil service days, and some of the interpretations that caused a great deal of confusion have been corrected; a lot have not. I have read into the record a number of times in this debate, and I will not repeat it now. Some of the things still on the books as to what you can do on the job and off the job—yard sign; you can go to a political rally, stand there, and not do anything else. The Hatch Act was interpreted to mean you could not attend a caucus in a State in one case and a whole host of things I have read into the record a number of times that are still in issue and have not been straightened out yet. That alone is what S. 135 is supposed to do. It is not supposed to solve all the problems of campaign finance reform. It does not change those. It is not supposed to change all the PAC law that needs changing. Sure, I agree with my colleague on that. This is not addressed to that. This is a different piece of legislation, a different subject. Are they related? Sure, they are related. But we deal with this now, and we deal with that when it comes down the pike, which I understand will be in a week or so, as soon as we dispose of this.

It was stated how would you like to sit across the table from an IRS auditor wearing a Dukakis button who is looking at your tax return? Now that is a good one, because let me just address that, under S. 135, if I could.

What is the situation right now? The interpretations of the Hatch Act right now prohibit a person from dealing in political activity on the job, but—and if I could have my colleagues' attention for one moment—but that person under current law can wear a campaign button, that IRS agent can wear a campaign button and sit there and, if he is for Dukakis, you would be sitting there looking at him with your Bush button on, and what do you think you would get? I do not know. I hope you would get fairness. Is there a little bit of partisanship exhibited there? Yes.

Under S. 135, that person is not permitted to wear a button on the job. So this would correct the very inequity the Senator from Wyoming is talking about. So we are correcting that one that gave the Senator from Wyoming a lot of heartburn a while ago. I would not want him staring at a Dukakis button, so we are going to correct that for him in S. 135. I guess he will be grateful and maybe willing to vote for S. 135 once we make clear what it does and does not do.

We heard repeated again that the Hatch Act is constitutional and does not involve the first amendment. I agree with that. The wretched history of our spoils system, which I also agree with, and with Tammany Hall, and I am sure we could add a few other cities to this where the cities had spoils system problems, but S. 135 is not election year politics. S. 135 is trying to bring some clarity out of the Hatch Act so we will know what we are trying to live up to or where we may go wrong in making an error and creating a violation of existing regulation or law or interpretation.

The Senator said he would like us to be honest that what this is about is pressure in a 1990 election year. What this does is clarify things so we will know what applies in an election year and every other year. I repeat once again, the facts are that whether it was 1981 or 1983 or 1989, or whenever that PAC's made contributions both on the Republican side, the Democratic side, or whatever sources, that this does not change that ability of PAC's to raise money one bit. It does not make it easier; it does not make it harder. We will address that in other legislation.

Will campaign contributions be possible from one another—from one another, were the words—within PAC's, within members of those organizations that have PAC's? Is there campaign solicitation done to put money into those multicandidate PAC's? Yes, there is right now. If we are going to change that, let us change that as we debate it on the floor next week. But would S. 135 change that and make it more possible for the unions that were named to raise money? It would not change that one bit. I repeat once again that I think what is being referred to is the House version of Hatch Act reform which goes a considerable distance beyond anything that we provide in S. 135.

I share the concern of my distinguished colleague when he talks about soft money and ethics and campaign finance reform, but that legislation will come in its own time. What we are trying to do now is deal with the existing Hatch Act. We do not open up the floodgates. We in no way propose that additional fundraising capability be provided. In fact, in this legislation, we specifically prohibit any Federal employee going out and publicly soliciting money. The only money that could be solicited would be within the PAC membership; and that is all. If we are going to change that, let us change it as we take up changes in the political action committee structure or limit them when that legislation comes along in a few days.

The statement was made why give PAC's a big boost with S. 135? As I said, it does not do that. I addressed earlier in the debate today, I believe, before the distinguished Senator from Wyoming was on the floor, the Dole situation when he made some speeches on the floor regarding the Hatch Act back in 1976. That was at a time when the Hatch Act was going to be virtually put out of existence. It was not completely eliminated, but it was really going to be gutted. That is what was being addressed at that time by Senator DOLE. So I do not think the same situation applies today.

The amendment which would delay the effective date of S. 135 until the Campaign Reform Act is passed I do not believe is warranted, I say, any more than we would tie a lot of other things on here, too.

As far as one of the final remarks, I believe was made, regarding S. 135 would be the destruction of careers, I submit just the opposite. I say now people are going to know what the law is, and we are going to sort out some of these interpretations of it. We are going to simplify things so that the destruction of careers is less likely going to happen than people inadvertently stumbling into a violation of the Hatch Act because they do not know the correct interpretation of the law.

Mr. President, I hope we will be talking from now on about the Senate version of the bill, because the Senate version of the bill says you cannot run for public office if you are a Government employee, and it also says you cannot go out and raise funds from the public; that current law continues on where PAC's can get their money.

At the appropriate time tomorrow, Mr. President, when we do have votes on this, I will be prepared to move to table it. I understand we will have time to debate all these amendments tomorrow before the votes occur, and, at the appropriate time, I will move to table the amendment of the distinguished Senator from Wyoming. I yield the floor.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I always enjoy a good, rich discussion with my friend from Ohio. There is no one more energized on issues, as I learned that when we came here and dealt with nuclear proliferation. The things he believes in he believes in deeply. He is doing a splendid job of floor managing this legislation. I admire him and always have long before I came here.

It is important that we indeed get to facts. I like that. That is where we must be. So if we can, let us go a little richer than just the word "facts." Let us go to the law of the United States of America, the present law. Let me read one particular section. This section will be repealed by this bill. Here is what it says:

> An employee in an executive agency, except one appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, may not request or receive from or give to an employee, a Member of Congress or an officer of the uniformed service, a thing of value for political purposes. An employee who violates this section shall be removed from office.

Now go to the criminal code. This part will not be repealed. It says, "A person receiving any salary or compensation for services by money derived from the Treasury of the United States." This part I read to you now will be repealed:

> * * * to knowingly solicit any contribution within the meaning of section 301 of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 from any other such officer, employee or person. Any person who violates this section shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than 3 years or both.

So, when my friend from Ohio says there is not much change, then let us go right to the bill. I like that—first remembering that the present law of the United States, the present Hatch Act says that a Federal employee is forbidden to solicit or handle political contributions or organize partisan fundraising activities. That is from a letter from the Justice Department to the committee telling why the legislation should be rejected. It is also included within the minority views dated October 17, and signed by a representative of the Justice Department, Carol T. Crawford, Assistant Attorney General.

But even if you do not want to deal with that, let us go to the bill. Let us go not to the House bill. Let us go to the Senate bill now before us, Calendar No. 295, S. 135, and go to page 4. Here is what it says. And if this is not a change in law, well, I remember that anecdote I used with Senator KENNEDY one time on the immigration bill about when my father and another lawyer in Cody, WY, handled every case on either side of the docket for about 30 years. Finally, in a burst of enthusiasm, this remarkable other attorney said, "If that's not the law, I'll eat the statute book." And my father stepped up to the plate and said, "If he does, he'll have more law in his gut than he's got in his head."

Now, that is not the case with my nonlawyer colleague from Ohio, whose skills are evident, both on Earth and outside the Earth. Here is what the bill says. Here it is, page 4, line 4:

> An employee may take an active part in political management or in political campaigns, except an employee may not—
> "(1) use his official authority or influence for the purpose of interfering with or affecting the result of an election;
>
> "(2) knowingly solicit, accept, or receive a political contribution from any person, unless—

And here is the kicker—> such person is

"(A) a member of the same Federal employee organization."

Now, if that is not a change in the law, I am lost, because there is the opener right there. It is so clear. It is blatant. It is real.

Then go on, where we also say "unless the solicitation is for a contribution to the multicandidate political committee as defined under the Federal Election Campaign Act of such Federal employee organization."

There it is. Now, we cannot use the sophistry of words and say there is no change because that is obviously a change, and it is dramatic. You have just under this bill repealed those two sections I read and then you have put in here that a person, indeed, may knowingly solicit, accept or receive a political contribution from any person if that person is a member of the same Federal employee organization.

That is what we are talking about. That gives us the creeps, because it does not have to be done on the job. That is fine. But off the job it is going to get done. And it is going to get done in ways that you could never legislate against in any possible way.

I will be glad to work with the Senator from Ohio as to how we might meet the intent which both of us have because he has stated it clearly. If there is no change, then there is no change. Then there is no change. Gertrude Stein could not do any better than that.

So let us work toward that. I am ready to assist because I like what he is saying. The only trouble is I have to stick with page 4, line 15, 16; line 13, line 14 of the bill. There it is—off the hook. It says they can do this. So we have something here which expands the rights of the Federal workers. It expands the rights of him to solicit, to get political contributions, and that is where we are. I wish it were not so. That is why I am here. But if that is not the purpose of the Senator from Ohio, I would like to pledge to work with him and see if we can resolve it. It is going to pass. It is going to go through here. Those of us who reject the bill and its provisions will have to urge the President to veto it and hope to sustain the veto with 34 votes. We certainly do not have 40.

Certainly these are things that I want to bring to the attention of the Senate. We can talk about apples and oranges. Both parties have now said we want to limit PAC's. We have kind of pounded our chest and run through the village the last few days, saying we want to get rid of PAC's. I assume there will be about 10 PAC receptions tonight, and as long as they're legal, many of us will still be going.

So both parties say they want to limit PAC's in their bills. The Republicans would eliminate them. The Democrats seriously cut them back. And then this bill, this curious bill would expand the coffers of certain PAC's, which under the Democratic bill on campaign reform can still contribute to the Democratic Party.

Why not wait until after the dust settles on what we do to the PAC's before we do these reforms? That is what I am asking. That is the purpose of my amendment. I know that the argument is made many times that coercion is still prohibited. At least we have put to bed the issue of constitutionality, because my friend from Ohio concedes that the Hatch Act is legal and that constitutionality is not an issue. And that is good.

I have been hearing about the abridgment of political expression. I have been hearing about the violation of the first amendment. That is in the Constitution. So, since I had, I just assumed that we were saying the Hatch Act was unconstitutional. I am ready to concede, and I appreciate that point. It is a constitutional thing and I agree. I do agree.

So here we are. Coercion, that is the issue for me. Coercion and pressure and political year. That is how we are here on this floor at this moment, no other reason.

There is no other reason to be here.

I guess I would just say can prohibit coercion all you want to under the law. I do not think it really does a good job of that. But that will not do when you expand permitted politicking because when you expand permitted politicking you expand expected politicking. That is what you do. It will not be a spoken requirement but an unspoken one. That is the way it was before for decades before we corrected it—no fingerprints, except bad government.

Then I must say, and I will admit there is a partisan shelling from the edge of the hills. Why is it that the only sponsors of this legislation are the unions of America, and the ACLU? I do not know. Nobody has ever answered that. Common Cause is on our side. That causes people a lot of concern in my party, some of them, although I was a member of Common Cause at one time. I sent in my five bucks, and studied their issues. I thought they did a lot of good things and some bad, but I got out just like I did with the ACLU when they got into racist issues in Skokie, IL. Those are real things.

But let us try to stick to what we are trying to do. If I would accept at face value what my friend from Ohio is saying, I would get on their bill as a cosponsor. And I would believe it. But I am constricted as a lawyer-legislator of some 25 years of duration to know I know what this says. I know that this is the ability to knowingly solicit, accept or receive a political contribution from any person who is a member of the same Federal employee organization, that is, the union. I think that is wrong. I think it is disgusting.

Thank you.

Mr. GLENN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I believe what the distinguished Senator from Wyoming said is exactly what I said. I believe—I do not know that we disagree particular—they can raise money now. But the language was changed basically under the bill which is in the committee report on page 16, down where we take out a section under title 18 of the bottom of page 16, the bracketed action, top part of that. Solicitation of political contributions. It shall be unlawful for, and then a number of things. Then it says a person receiving any salary or compensation for services for money derived from Treasury of the United States. Then we took out this part that says to knowingly solicit the contribution, within the meaning, so and so, on top of page 17, and then added other legislation which was basically intended and which I do believe spells out better what can be done.

That is what is in the legislation. That is what is on page 4 and page 5. It was mainly in drafting. It was not meant to weaken it. It refers back to the bottom of that section at the top of page 17, under B, references back to section 7323 and 7324 of the title.

Those are political activities, prohibitions and so on in those earlier sections. I think that does clarify. It was not that it does not open anything up. The Federal employees can—employee organization leaders—solicit contributions now. Retired members of those employee organizations can solicit contributions, but PAC employee organization leaders right now can ask for money. That is not anything new in the law. Maybe I could see how there could possibly be an interpretation, but it was not really intended I guess where one member can solicit another as opposed to being limited only to the organization or retired members. I just do not see how that is important.

So what was mainly intended by redoing the language here was mainly to clarify things and spell it out better so people would not be in any doubt about what they can do and what they cannot do.

I just do not want to offer below this particular part of what the change was. The change was intended to help clarify that. I think it can be better clarifying language. We certainly are willing to consider that.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, it is very helpful to me to hear the sponsor's comments. That is most important.

This is a curious exercise in scalpel work here. If there is no change in present law, what are all the words for? This is a good question. If there is no change in the Federal law, is this a creature of staff here overwrought and overworked, padding around in their padded chamber, did they cook this up? Is this one of those cooked jobs by creative frustrated people who are thinking, "Wait a minute, got to do it in a way where those of us like the Senator from Ohio and myself want to do it." And if I heard what he said, I am ready to do that. But that is not what this says.

This bill takes out a provision of existing law under section 602, and then comes around, using the italicized language on page 17 of the report which says the prohibition in subsection (a) shall not apply to any activity of an employee as defined under section 7321 of title 5 or any individual employed under the U.S. Postal Service or the Postal Rate Commission unless that activity is prohibited by section 7323 or 7324.

What is it all about? Because if the issue is really that you really do not want to make any change in existing law, I have a great idea. Let us not do it. They just leave this off, and say this. Will somebody join me in this? Because then I can get close to listening to what we are trying to do here. If somebody can tell me why we do not put in this bill that "you cannot knowingly solicit, accept, or receive a political contribution from any person who is a member of the same Federal employees' organizations." Is anyone ready to do that? I am ready to do that. I hear that is what everybody else wants to do. If that is the case, let us do it. That is where I am.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I point out to my distinguished colleague that if he reads down to the bottom of that part on the top of page 17, after all the things permitted there, unless that activity is prohibited by section 7323 or 7324 of that title, go back to page 15 and 16, and it spells it out directly, or in the part of the bill here that is 7323 and 7324. It is spelled out specifically what they can do.

So I still do not see where there is such a big change here that would make such a difference in what PAC's can or cannot do. How does this make a change in the amount that the PAC's can collect, what they are authorized to do, or what they can collect now, or what they can collect later, or how people can be forced into a contribution or not? It does not change that one bit, nor was it intended to.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, let me inquire of my friend from Ohio. The question is—and I ask it again—let us redirect to the member of the same Federal employee organization. My question—and I just asked it—was this: Is the Senator from Ohio saying—and I hear him saying that there has been no change in the law, and yet now, under this bill proposed, we are going to allow an employee to take an active part in political campaigns—that is what this says—and we are going to allow him or her to knowingly solicit, accept, or receive a political contribution from any person who is a member of the same Federal employee organization.

Does the sponsor of the bill embrace that language?

Mr. GLENN. Yes, that is correct.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, if that is the case, then that would be what current law is, except that is not what is said here. Why, then, have we gone about repealing the section I read previously several minutes ago, and then why have we gone and repealed the section on—the two sections I related to were the sections on page 13 of the report language and page 16 of the report language. What is the purpose of repealing that? And the Common Cause letter, I have to believe that they do good legal work.

Archibald Cox was a professor of mine. You see these things coming out of my background which are dazzling. He was a professor of mine in labor law at Colorado University when I was using the GI bill. I have great respect for Arch Cox. They say in their letter that S. 135 "proposes major changes in the Hatch Act, lifting most restrictions on partisan political activity. It allows Government workers to solicit their colleagues for contributions for their own Federal employee PAC's. It would increase the potential for widespread abuse, and with basic restrictions on partisan activity repealed, no procedural or other safeguards will be sufficient to protect against the subtle forms of political favoritism or coercion of Federal workers."

That is the statement from Common Cause, signed by Fred Wertheimer, a remarkable individual who does good things in many cases, and that is their legal interpretation of this bill.

I am ready to sit down, and we will be glad to work in the evenings or the days to get to what I think is being said but is not reflected in this legislation by a very deft use of in one side then out and around the horn. That is not going to sell.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, let me spell it out exactly as to what you can and cannot do. Under current law, one employee cannot solicit another employee for a contribution to a PAC. The employee organization leader can, and the retired members of the same employee organization can solicit contributions. Where the employed leaders have had to do this personally, all this does is open up so they can designate other people to run the PAC for the organization. That is true, whatever it is, whether it is the Chamber of Commerce or a business organization or labor or whatever. That was not intended. Nor do I see it operating in a way that is some great loophole that will mean that additional millions and millions will be levied or coerced out of members of whatever organization. That was all that was intended by that part, all that was written into it, and any other interpretation of it goes well beyond anything that I see that is warranted.

The things that are still prohibited are the things that are listed in sections 7323 and 7324 of the earlier titles in S. 135. So I do not see how any of those changes can be construed to result in opening the floodgates, as my distinguished colleague had indicated he feels might be the case.

Mr. SIMPSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. SIMPSON].

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, let me ask the sponsor, in legislation of this nature, and in his excellent work with the Governmental Operations Committee as chairman, have we ever had a definition like this in legislation, where we have this new phrase, a "Federal employee organization"? Because that is the one that gets to me. There are probably 3 million people who could fit a "Federal employee organization," if you were to mention labor union, which is what that kind of legislation usually states. I could understand it then. But if it is going to say "Federal employee organization," what does it mean? Who is covered under this? Is this a spectrum of 3 million people or 800,000 people?

I guess my question is, without question, it seems to me, as one who has tried to come current on this, it is obvious, is it not, that this expands current law and, therefore, if it expands current law into 400,000 more people or 800,000 more people or the potential pool of 3 million people, is it not then, obviously, a change in the law?

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I am told that OPM made a definition of "Federal employee organization," but we do not have it here at the moment. We will get that. To me, if you go back in the definition section, 7322, it says employee means "any individual, other than the President or Vice President, employed or holding office in an executive agency, other than GAO, or a position within competitive service which is not in an executive agency but does not include a member of the uniformed services."

I presume that—I should not presume anything until we get what OPM has said about Federal employee organization. We will get that. I think the general interpretation is that it would be employee organization or union within the Government. They all qualify as unions, I believe. This would apply to that.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I do not have any problem, I guess, with people participating. Let me say that very clearly. If more people want to participate in government, that does not send any rigors through me. But what is the purpose and why is it so essential to allow more people to solicit? That is the question I have next.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I would respond by saying that the intention was, right now, only the elected union leaders could do this, and for a large organization to let them delegate that to some of the other people, I think it only makes common sense that that is what would be done under other PAC's, I believe.

I see no reason they should be prohibited here. I do not think you are going to see under this any great flood of people where everybody is dunning everybody else within a particular union or employee organization for money. That was not the intent, nor would it actually operate that way.

So this was not meant to open any floodgates, nor do I see how it would. I read the specifics here a moment ago as to exactly who can and who cannot solicit money now, and who would or would not be able to solicit funds after S. 135 is passed, and it does not vary hardly at all. So I do not see the difference here.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I do see the difference. What is the purpose other than to see how many union people can be designated? Is that the whole union? That is what this is. When you consider that the only people crying for this bill are the unions, and a very limited amount of unions really, the heavy hitters, the 3 million of them who we really take awfully good care of because, as I say, they live right here and so for decades they have been well taken care of because they live in Virginia, the District, and Maryland and they are tough, tough, tough. When they come in here they usually get what they want. This is the ultimate want list right here.

If the purpose is to allow participation, as I say, I am fine, then we could just strike the provision about the expansion of minions, surrogate union leaders which can go out into the campus and solicit money.

How did 55 cosponsors come on this if there is no change in the law in this area, while they are whacking us to shreds? It looks like John Coulter trying to get out of the West when he was apprehended in 1805. You have to run down through here to get out of the building because there they are. What is the purpose of that, if there is not much change?

I am willing to let them participate. I do not know why we need to have surrogate union leaders to dun on them at Sunday picnics to get money for the unions and PAC's when we have the hypocrisy that we are going to get rid of the the PAC's within a few weeks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBB). The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, we may or may not get rid of PAC's in a few weeks. I do not know. That is a subject of other legislation.

I would say I think it is akin to what we run into in our own Senate campaigns here. I am sure the distinguished Senator from Wyoming is not the person who every time he wants to raise money does it absolutely personally and receiving every single dollar and asks for it personally.

That is why fundraisers do not force people to give it. It is voluntary. They can ask them to give if they want to. That will be what is done with the people involved carrying out what the leaders have to do right now and then have to rely on that, has been ruled to be legit. They have used retired members of the organizations and so have at this time contributions. Should that not be changed? I do not know. That may be part of what we want to discuss here on the floor when all this PAC legislation comes up.

But I do not see that is any different from us delegating fundraising activities to somebody else in the organizations, and that is all you are talking about here. This is not supposed to open up any huge floodgates.

Let me just say, in response to commenting about the civil service, I do not know whether the Senator from Wyoming was talking about the civil service people being well taken care of, if that is what he was talking about. But having been through a number of hearings on the Governmental Affairs Committee about what happened to our civil service in this country, I do not believe he can be talking about how well we have been taking care of civil servants, because over the last 10 years they are some 26 percent behind the civilian counterparts in salary raises and current salaries. We have yet to deal with that, largely because of our own inability to deal with our own pay problems right here on the floor, as the distinguished Senator from Wyoming is aware. We have not addressed that.

So when he talks about civil servants being well taken care of, I respectfully disagree; we have not dealt with that. We are getting far enough behind the civilian counterparts now. Unless we deal with that soon, that is going to be a serious problem in Government. That is not directly part of this, but I wanted to make that comment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I hear that argument. I have heard that one in my 12 years. I am always just as intrigued with it as the Senator from Ohio, in a different way. We are saying unless we raise the salaries of those of us in Congress no one will run. There are a lot of people waiting to run for my seat. They do not care what the salary is. They just want to come and retool things or bring their own agenda and get cracking. They are not interested in the money.

So, you come to this situation: How come it is then when you advertise in the communities of America, there is a Federal job open in the Postal Service and 2,500 people come and stand in line? Somebody tell me why that is.

The reason is that it is a good job, with security and benefits that are not there in the private sector. They just aren't.

Everything sounds good in debate until you open a civil service job numbered G or whatever it is, so and so, and advertise for it and then watch the human beings in America come toward it because they would quit their job to get that job, and that is reality.

It has been a good debate and I appreciate the indulgence of the Chair and sponsor who I greatly admire. Now the mask is really off because you increase the number of union designated collectors of money and that is what this does. You increase the number of Federal employee organizations. That is what this does. You have then unmasked the bill.

This is why these unions have been beating our brains out for years and finally how they got here to this point where they could do this final act in an election year with the pressures of reform. Here we are, right in the face of campaign reform problems increasing the number of union-designated collectors of money.

I tell you and I say to my friend from Ohio, you bet I do that. I am a partisan. And, boy, I have to go raise money. I hope I can get delegates. I might like to find 5,000 surrogates to go raising money for my campaign.

But my job is political and these people, their sworn duty is to run the U.S. Government. That is their duty. They have no other duty but to assist us in running the Government of the United States. They are charged. That is their charge, to administer this Government impartially and without partisanship. This is a direct—you can call it anything you want to—a direct and appalling spear into that bosom, and I will tell you it is, and it is unattractive and that is why the Hatch Act had been there for 51 years and that is why I hope it will be there for 51 more years. If it is not there for 51 more years it will not be 51 years before we come back here to change it. It will be about two. And the people of America are going to say, good Lord, I never dreamed what I was dealing with.

You should have seen the squirrel that came to see me the other day from the department of so and so, gave me the biggest line about George Bush or Dukakis or whoever. I did not have to listen to that stuff. I am not paying that guy.

That is where we are. I am a partisan. Federal employees are not supposed to be partisan.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. GLENN].

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I think we have about exhausted things on both sides. I shall respond one more time. As far as my reference to congressional pay, and now we deal with civil servants, it was that in the past, as the distinguished Senator from Wyoming is well aware, there has been a linkage between the salary of Members of Congress and the salary of Government employees. I am fully aware that people are out there looking for our jobs, running against us, and spending millions to get here even though the pay is not the main thing, and I know that. But the problem in referring to civil service, what I was referring to was that our pay here has been linked to what civil service gets. They have not hired a top bioscientist, for instance, for 10 years out at NIH. NASA has difficulty attracting good people in the Government these days, good scientists and people to do the experimental work that needs to be done. It is a similar thing across the board on top-level Government salaries. They are tied to ours by custom, by precedent and not by legislation.

But we have always been unwilling to delink and consider the other needs of Government separate from our own, and so the civil service salaries overall have been, over the past 10 years, about 26 percent behind the civilian counterparts. Are there people willing to take those jobs? Yes. Do people stand in line for postal jobs which are pretty good jobs? Yes; they sure do.

Some of the other civil service jobs are not quite that good, but until we find people to fit in those jobs—of course, we can find bodies to fill the jobs at whatever salary we are willing to pay.

But I would submit at the same time that we talk about a $1.2 trillion or $1.3 trillion or $1.4 trillion budget, we do not want to fill those jobs with just anybody, any old body that we can get to accept that particular salary, whatever it is. We should be competitive with the people who are good people. So I do not agree with this whole thing.

Finally, increasing collectors was not meant that this was a great, huge increase in capability. It was meant to broaden it out a little bit, as we do in our own offices here. As far as applying terms to it, such as unmask, and appalling, and a spear in the bosom, that just overstates it considerably.

You are right, the Federal employees have their duties, which is to run the Government. And I think where it can be done they also have a right to participate in our political processes, where it does not interfere with that running of the Government.

That is all this tries to do, is straighten out some of the difficulties with the Hatch Act that have grown up through decades of abuse and misuse, and clarify what can be done on the job and what can be done off the job, so that all these hundreds and thousands of interpretations that have been confusing to people are taken care of. We only do this in S. 135 because OPM and those people in Government have not addressed this and really tried to straighten it out. Otherwise, this legislation would not have been necessary. It does not go beyond that in its purpose.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I do think that this has been a good debate. I have always enjoyed that with the Senator from Ohio, and this again. I thank him for that opportunity.

I still say that I would be very pleased to try to work with the Senator from Ohio. Realizing that I do not work from a huge power base on this particular bill, I can feel the train coming through. But, still, some of the things he has said in the debate, I agree with totally, and I would like to see them borne out in the language.

But the part that gives me the continuing pain and concern is our Government. It does not matter who is President, George Bush or Michael Dukakis. And that is the number of people who are going to be expanded under this bill to be able to solicit their fellow man in Federal employee organizations. It does not even say union. Let us say union; that is more honest.

But expanding this to 400,000 people, who will be the new political solicitors. That is Federal employees, plus 600,000 postal workers. That is the new pool of political solicitors in the United States. I think that is very wrong. I think it is a real mistake to have the people that haul the mail—and they are in some difficulty politically on this floor as they continue to ask us for more money, they continue to ask for the rate raises, and we never see any increase in productivity.

They want to get off budget. Who does not? If you get off budget, you get more money. Does anybody know why everybody wants to get off budget around here? So you can get more bucks, whether you are Social Security, postal, the Federal Financing Bank, or the REA. Get off budget. Good for America, Yes, that is why the debt limit is $3 trillion 122 billion.

I just have a grave thought that it is not the appropriate time to suddenly expand solicitors of political money with that many new solicitors who are surrogates of the union, I guess. I do know what else to say. And as I say, we are dramatically changing the law. Let us just say that we are then, because we are. If this bill passes, we have dramatically changed the law.

We have put together an army of solicitors, all of them paid by the Federal Treasury, to go out and walk around in their own membership off duty. I do not think that is what the Founding Fathers had in mind. But we let it happen for years. Then Congress got so disgusted with it, it was cut off. That is why the Hatch Act is on the books.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum has been suggested. The clerk will call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I first want to offer the second amendment that I indicated to the distinguished Senator from Ohio I would offer and then, maybe, go back to discuss the first amendment I offered. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the other amendments be set aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 1588

(Purpose: To amend chapter 73 of title 5, United States Code, to provide for penalties for employees violating certain prohibitions on political activities)

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. DOLE] proposes an amendment numbered 1588.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 6, insert between lines 3 and 4 the following new section:

"§ 7326. Penalties

"Any employee who has been determined by the Merit Systems Protection Board to have violated on two occasions any provision of section 7323 or 7324 of this title, shall upon such second determination by the Merit Systems Protection Board be removed from such employee's position, in which event that employee may not thereafter hold any position (other than an elected position) as an employee (as defined in section 7322(1) of this title).".

On page 6, insert between lines 11 and 12, immediately after the matter preceding line 12, the following:

"7326. Penalties.".

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the Hatch Act currently provides in section 7325 that—

An employee or individual who violates section 7324 of this title shall be removed from his position, and funds appropriated for the position removed thereafter may not be used to pay the employee or individual. However, if the Merit Systems Protection Board finds by unanimous vote that the violation does not warrant removal, a penalty of not less than 30 days' suspension without pay shall be imposed by direction of the Board.

Mr. President, if S. 135 becomes law, this particular provision, which both helps with the enforcement of Hatch Act violations and also serves as a deterrent to illegal conduct, will no longer be law.

When S. 135 was reported out of committee, it contained no significant penalty provisions. Not only had the drafters of S. 135 gutted the Hatch Act of any meaningful limitation on partisan political activity by Federal employees, they also gutted it of any meaningful penalty provisions.

On the Senate floor, we have the amendment which was offered by Senator GLENN, the manager of the bill, and agreed to which is basically jurisdictional in nature—it authorizes special counsel to seek corrective action in the same way as if a prohibited personnel practice were involved. No mandatory penalties are imposed for violations of the Hatch Act as a result of this amendment.

There has also been an amendment to S. 135 which has been agreed to which provides certain penalties for coercive political activities.

I do not believe that either of these amendments goes far enough:

The one amendment offered by the distinguished manager of the bill, Senator GLENN, leaves disciplinary action completely at the discretion of the Office of Special Counsel. The other amendment, offered by the distinguished Presiding Officer, Senator ROBB, applies only to coercion and not other violations of the Hatch Act.

The amendment that I am submitting for consideration mandates permanent suspension from employment by the Government of the United States of any employee found guilty on two occasions of violating any of the prohibited activities set forth in sections 7323 and 7324.

As with my previous amendment, this amendment is identical to the one I offered in 1976, in connection with Hatch Act reform legislation and which passed the Senate by a vote of 53 to 38. This amendment was also supported by almost all the same Senators who supported the amendment to exclude IRS, CIA, and Justice Department employees from the relaxed standards of the reform amendments.

Again, I will notify each other of the Senators who supported the amendment to exclude the IRS, the CIA, the Justice Department, and now the Federal Elections Commission. My view is they should be taken out of this act.

While I believe that some flexibility is merited for first time offenders, a strong mandatory penalty should be stipulated for repeated violations. The penalty, permanent dismissal from the Civil Service, would serve both to send a strong deterrent message to those tempted to violate the Hatch Act and to terminate those employees who willfully break the law after they have had fair warning of their prohibited conduct.

Mr. President, I suggest this amendment would help solve the problem. That is all I have to say on the second amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KERREY). The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, the amendment by the distinguished Senator from Kansas, I believe, would remove an employee from the Government if the Merit Systems Protection Board deems them to have violated section 7323. They would be removed after the second offense; is that correct?

Mr. DOLE. 7323 and 7324.

Mr. GLENN. I am very much in sympathy with this. I would probably be moved to accept his amendment if we could make sure by either adding language or by legislative history right here on the floor when those violations come before the Merit Systems Protection Board, that that employee has the right of appeal to Federal court he or she normally would have, to appeal an MSPB ruling.

That is the way it is now. If they disagree with the MAPB ruling, then they can take it to Federal court if they feel they have been dealt with unfairly. We were not proposing to change any of that here, of course. The way it is worded:

Any employee who has been determined by the Merit Systems Protection Board to have violated section 7323 and subsequently is determined by the board to have violated such section shall, on second determination, be removed from Federal service.

I presume, in reading that, that the intent would be the employees would still have all the protections of law, they can appeal and go to Federal court, and if they got a favorable ruling in Federal court, that that would expunge from the record then the earlier violation as deemed to be a violation by the Merit Systems Protection Board.

Mr. DOLE. If the Seantor will yield, that is certainly the intent. It may be we need to clarify it with some language. I do not want to deprive anyone of their rights. I want to make certain if it happens a second time and it is appealed as far as the appeal is permitted and it is still found he or she violated 7323 or 7324, then that person would be suspended.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, if we can have that understanding, or perhaps since we are goint to vote on it until tomorrow anyway, maybe we can insert a clause that would make that Federal appeal over into the judicial system, if we can spell that out so it makes very clear that an MSPB decision can still be appealed to the court then.

Mr. DOLE. Maybe we might just withhold final action on the amendment to see if we cannot get our staff to reach an agreement. I think it would be very easy to do.

Mr. GLENN. As far as kicking out a two-time violator, that is fine with me. There should not be a one-time violator. Two times around, that is enough. Their appeals process is in place if they feel they have a just case. I probable would be willing to accept this.

Mr. DOLE. I just make one or two points. As I understand it, this is still the pending amendment. We will try to modify it, and if we can reach some agreement, the amendment will be accepted. If that is the case, then there would still be one amendment pending.

I would like to touch on a few points the distinguished Senator from Ohio raised in his response to my statement earlier on that first amendment.

The manager says that the employees of these agencies will not wrongfully use this information since they are prohibited by law from doing so. It seems to me that we need more of a safeguard, because politics will create strong additional pressures, to leak or otherwise use such information against whatever.

We are not supposed to leak information in the Senate, but look what happened to Tim Ryan who was the nominee for high office here just a few weeks ago. Somehow something was leaked on his FBI report.

It seems to me we need to provide all the safeguards, and that is why I think these very sensitive areas—CIA, FBI, the IRS and the Federal Elections Commission—ought to be out of this bill. There should not be any reason for them to be kept.

I agree with the Senator from Ohio who reaffirmed the civil service should be, and always should be, based on merit. While I disagree S. 135 advances that cause because I think, again, in my view, and in the view of Senator SIMPSON and others who may misread it or read it differently than the Senator from Ohio, this will introduce politics into the workplace.

It has also been said that S. 135 really clarifies any confusion on the do's and don'ts currently under the Hatch Act. I know the distinguished Senator from Delaware [Mr. ROTH] had a bill which would have directed the Office of Personnel Management to issue regulations to clarify what is legal and illegal under the Hatch Act.

It seems to me that would be the best thing we could do: Keep the present law, eliminate the confusion, because there is confusion, as pointed out by the Senator from Ohio, and the confusion pointed out, I guess, in my statement when I talked about the bottom. The Senator from Ohio is correct, the Senator from Kansas is inaccurate.

The distinguished manager also indicates that S. 135 does not permit employees of IRS, CIA, Justice, and FEC to solicit campaign contributions. If that language is in the bill, my staff has not been able to find it, because we are informed that employees of the same labor unions can solicit one another off hours for contributions to the PAC's. Members of the same labor unions or employees of the same, say they are AFGE or postal workers, can solicit one another off hours for contributions to their PAC. An employee can get on the phone at night, whenever the hours end, 5:30, 6, whatever, and solicit. If that is not the case, then I think that is important and I hope we can find the language that can be pointed out to us.

I think there is the overriding fear that once you can do all the things you are going to do under the S. 135, there is no way you are going to keep politics out of the workplace, and the Congressional Research Service study, which has been printed in the RECORD, deals with the statutory authority of agencies to issue their own regulations restricting political activity.

I quote just one paragraph in that study. It is talking about cases, American postal workers and others. This is the Congressional Research study, page CRS 4:

> The implication from these cases would appear to be that an agency would need some statutory basis of authority, a provision adopted by Congress, to further limit first amendment rights of individuals, including its own employees. This would appear to be consistent with previous cases concerning agency authority and due process which noted that a Federal agency, to limit first amendment rights and other fundamental liberties of individuals, needs a clear and precise delegation of that authority from Congress.

So it would seem to me they are, in effect, buttressing the argument we made. The thrust of the study is, in order to have authority to issue such regulations, there must be some way, some statutory language to authorize, and S. 135 eliminates the statutory language that we have. I have just read that quotation from the report.

I think the distinguished Senator from Wyoming, Senator SIMPSON, and the Senator from Ohio, have had a long discussion on political action committees and why we are debating this bill when we are supposed to be eliminating political action committees. Why are we trying to make it easier for Members to be solicited and contribute to political action committees or Federal employee unions? I assume in the campaign finance reform we ban all PAC's and there would not be much demand for this bill.

I think if we ban PAC's, as I hope we will in the Senate, then there may be an amendment even to this bill to ban all political action committees. That would be a nongermane amendment that may not be offered to this bill. It may be just to indicate we cannot have it both ways. We cannot pass legislation that says we ought to beef up PAC's and talk about at the same time banning PAC's.

That debate will follow the deliberation of this bill or could come on this particular measure sometime later this week.

So with those responses, it is my understanding that the vote on this amendment will occur—I guess they occur in sequence starting tomorrow morning at 11 or 11:30?

It has not been set. If it has not been set, I would hope that there might be some brief opportunity on this particular amendment to have at least 5 or 10 minutes of discussion tomorrow morning on the amendment.

I think it is an important amendment. I indicated before that I offered it in 1976 along with Senator BENTSEN and it was supported by at least a dozen Members who now support S. 135, a dozen members who are still here. The amendment was adopted by a vote of 68 to 23. It was a very lopsided margin. And I really do not believe there has been that much change since 1976.

The CIA is still a special category. The IRS is still in a special category. The Justice Department is certainly in a special category. The only change is that since 1976 we now have the Federal Elections Commission, and these are the very people dealing with cases involving all of us right on the Senate floor and Congress, our contributors, whatever. I do not really believe we want to politicize those agencies. I have letters from the Attorney General, from the IRS Commissioner, and from the FEC Chairman in opposition. They do not want to be a part of this. But I guess they can be forced to do it in any event, though I will offer an amendment tomorrow that will require a referendum in each division. The IRS union covering that group, at least there ought to be a majority before they are forced into this particular measure.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I have one correction. I think there has been a little misunderstanding on who can solicit whom if S. 135 passes. One of the earlier amendments we passed after the bill came to the floor added a section under 7323. (A) says "a Member of the same Federal employee organization" and then that (B) was changed to "not a subordinate employee."

In other words, the distinguished Senator from Kansas said if we pass this the boss would be able to solicit a subordinate. That is specifically prohibited by the addition of the early amendment after we came to the floor.

The (B) on this is solicitation for a contribution to multicandidate. That was moved down to section C. So I believe we have taken care of that particular issue and we can discuss that later, if the Senator likes.

Mr. DOLE. If the Senator will yield, I will be happy to have my staff examine it. They can get together when they are looking at our amendment.

Mr. GLENN. Good. We have a copy of it here.

Mr. DOLE. That is an important area that should be addressed.

Mr. GLENN. I agree with the Senator 100 percent. That was addressed in the committee and was supposed to be part of that when it came to the floor. That was an oversight here.

The minority leader's remarks included reference to a similar amendment that was passed in 1976, but I would point out that that amendment was to a bill which would have allowed Federal employees to solicit money from the general public, and that is illegal under S. 135. You cannot do that.

The House bill is different. Under this bill, S. 135, to go out and solicit money from the general public would be strictly illegal.

Back in those days, his amendment to that same bill would have allowed Federal employees to run for partisan political office. Now that also is illegal under S. 135. You cannot do that. The House bill once again is, I believe, being confused with this one. It has been brought up a number of times in the debate. I think there is some confusion on it. But under S. 135, you would not be permitted to raise funds from the public, nor could you run for partisan political office.

A similar amendment to that of the minority leader involving intelligence agency employees was considered by the Governmental Affairs Committee during its markup. The amendment was defeated in committee because the bill does not allow any Federal employee to raise money from the public or to hold partisan political office. Except for these activities, there is little reason to restrict intelligence agency employees or IRS employees or any other Federal employees from other kinds of political activities.

So just to sum up, I do not agree with the amendment by the distinguished Senator from Kansas. I am against it because it addresses a problem that I feel does not exist. It is applicable to a 15-year-old bill that was different in very major respect from S. 135.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Ohio. We certainly will take a look at the statements he has made. I am advised by staff that the definition of superior and subordinate in letter carriers is fairly difficult to make. I am also advised this bill will open up approximately 400,000 more Federal employees who can solicit from each other, 400,000 Federal employees and 600,000 postal employees. That is a million Federal employees who are going to be able to solicit now who could not solicit before. Do not tell me, if that is the case—I am going to check the accuracy—that is not going to bring in millions, and millions, and millions of dollars of new PAC money. If you can turn a million people loose who could not heretofore solicit and say now you can solicit, it would seem to me to open up a big, big pot of gold for the Democratic Party.

I can understand why the Democrats want to rush this through. If it is effective this year, it may be of some help to somebody. But it does not mean it is good legislation. I do not know whether the Senator will quarrel with the 1-million person figure or not.

Mr. GLENN. I would reply to the distinguished minority leader that we debated this a while ago when Senator SIMPSON was on the floor. It was never the intent of this bill that every employee is going to be out soliciting every other employee in the Civil Service.

I would be quite happy to accept some limitation on that.

As I pointed out a little while ago, union leaders right now are the only ones permitted to solicit for a contribution to a PAC. It has also been interpreted that retired members of the same employee organizations can solicit contributions. All that was intended with this was as we do in our own Senate offices; we do not all make every single phone call asking for money or for solicitation. That can be assigned to a committee or it can be assigned to some other people to help out in that regard. That is what was intended with this particular provision.

So to take the total number of union members and say they are all going to be soliciting each other, there is going to be a mighty big solicitation job when they get done with that one.

That was never what was intended. Perhaps we can come together in some colloquy or legislative language there will spell out what was intended, but that raises the specter of everybody almost soliciting everybody else, all within that organization now. Nobody can go outside. Under S. 135 you cannot go outside and solicit from the general public. In the House bill you can. In the House bill you can do that, and in the House bill you can also run for office, run for partisan political office. We do not do that in this bill. So you could not go outside your organization and you could not put people to work out there. You could not have this 400,000 out there soliciting from the public because in this bill solicitation from the public is prohibited by anyone who is "Hatched."

Mr. DOLE. If the Senator will yield, I think you could create some umbrella organization, just say Federal employees' PAC. Then it is not to any one Member. It is just one big organization, which in my view would even be worse than I thought.

I think maybe we can address that section if it is not the intent. Maybe again staff can look at it. If the bill is going to pass, we want to make certain it passes as intended by the distinguished chairman and by some of us who feel it should not pass. It will probably pass. Some would not like to fix it up. I would like to fix it up in case it could pass so that it has precisely the intended results that the chairman has indicated. I think that is the chairman's purpose.

Mr. GLENN. I do not object to that at all. I think one of the earlier interpretations that came out in some of our debate, I believe last week, indicated that some people I think felt that what we are creating here was everybody in the union could descend on the public and ask for money. That is not part of this bill. In fact, that is, specifically in this bill, prohibited from going outside. So it is much more limited.

Mr. DOLE. Somebody indicated today that every letter carrier in America could descend on the public on a Sunday before the election as volunteers. They all know their routes. So you just get them altogether, say, OK, give 90 percent of your money to the Democrats, we are going to go out on Sunday, and we are going to make a mail drop. You all show up and go through your regular route. I cannot believe that is the intent. But that can be done.

Do not say it will not happen. These people are pretty sharp. Why should they not all show up on Sunday? It is after working hours. They do not deliver mail on Sunday. But they go around their regular routes, drop off who knows what on every household. If they want to drop in on the Democratic households, maybe that would be all right. But they will drop in on Republican households, too. Maybe we can tighten that up, too.

Mr. GLENN. We might be able to.

Mr. DOLE. People have a lot of imagination around here.

Mr. GLENN. If the letter carriers became that organized, and they are out making their rounds, I imagine probably someone in the Chamber of Commerce——

Mr. DOLE. They do not know the route.

Mr. GLENN. Would be right along behind them in a follow-up vehicle and deliver the same thing. That is possible, too.

Mr. DOLE. As far as I know, the Chamber of Commerce does not have a route.

Mr. GLENN. They will follow the postal workers in that case.

As I understand the parliamentary situation, all the votes will be put off until tomorrow. I will establish a quorum call in just a moment. I believe the majority leader still wishes to be heard this afternoon. I do not know whether he will be back or not. But I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I might proceed as though in morning business for 8 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

JACOB WETTERLING

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, the Senate is honored by two visitors in the Public Gallery this afternoon, Patty and Trevor Wetterling, the mother and brother of Jacob Wetterling of St. Joseph, MN, a few miles from where I grew up in Stearns County, MN. As my colleagues and much of our viewing audience today knows, Jacob is the 11-year-old young man abducted by a stranger with a handgun outside St. Joseph, MN, 7 months ago. Jacob's photograph is on the front of my podium here. They are here in our city to participate in a broadcast of the "Larry King Live" show, which will be broadcast this evening over the CNN network at 9 p.m. eastern daylight time.

They are here on Jacob's behalf, and also on behalf of the thousands of children abducted each year in America. The Justice Department last week released a report entitled "Missing, Abducted, Runaway, and Thrownaway Children in America." That report makes frighteningly clear the magnitude of the threat faced by children in this society, and calls on us to put more study and resources into reducing this terrible trauma. Excerpts of the report appear at the end of my statement today.

The focus today is on Jacob; but what this report tells us is that there are about 4,000 Jacob Wetterlings in America each year. That is more than one abduction by a stranger for each person in Jacob's hometown of St. Joseph, MN. We need to face this serious national problem, and we need to get to work on solutions.

Ironically, Mr. President, there are many ways in which the tragedy of Jacob's abduction has demonstrated the higher qualities that our fellow Americans possess.

First, there has been the courage of Jacob's family. Their love and concern for their son and his brother has powerfully endured over these many weeks, and is the force behind the efforts to bring him home. Their advocacy on behalf of other children, and in the whole area of child safety, has been both inspirational and practical in preventing future abductions.

The efforts of Jacob's neighbors in central Minnesota has been equally awe-inspiring. On Friday it was announced that a reward of up to $200,000 had been raised for information leading to Jacob's safe return and the arrest of a suspect in the case was raised in that community. But the money is only the most visible representation of this community's reaching out to the Wetterlings. Countless hours have been freely donated by ordinary people to raise both funds and public awareness around the country, to multiply the eyes and ears on this case. This poster, or one like it, is in thousands of stores, offices, and other public places around the country because of people who care enough to set aside their normal tasks and to go to work to find Jacob Wetterling.

Also, Mr. President, I want to pay special tribute this afternoon to the law enforcement people who have done more than is humanly possible to find Jacob, and bring him home. Jacob has had a virtual army of law enforcement officials from local to State to Federal, working day and night—and I mean literally day and night—on his behalf. These highly skilled and conscientious professionals have brought every resource of criminology to this case. Someday, the names of the heroes of this effort will be brought before us all to thank them for their successful effort in bringing Jacob home. The coordination among the various agencies on the national, State and local level has been exemplary; the incredible amount of resources which have been made available—literally hundreds of people and thousands of man hours—have been carefully and wisely managed for maximum impact.

For today, these law enforcement officials prefer that I not use their names. The reason is that they want every bit of attention focused on the task, and none of them. And that says quite a bit about this outstanding group and about the cause.

Let me just express my gratitude and that of the Wetterling family and all the people of central Minnesota and all of the people of Minnesota, for your outstanding work to date and for the sacrifices that you and law enforcement people will continue to make until this case is solved.

Mr. President, the New Testament teaches that: "Greater love has no man than this: that he lays down his life for his friends." Jacob Wetterling, by that definition, has many, many great friends. And that, in the end, is what is going to bring him home to St. Joseph.

For those who are watching this proceeding outside the Senate, I would ask that you take a minute to look at this photograph or to make a mental note to be on the lookout for Jacob Wetterling. He is 11 years old, about 5 feet tall—although his mom says he's probably taller by now—after 7 months and weighed about 75 pounds at that time, and may have put on a little weight since then. He has blue eyes, brown hair, and a mole on his left cheek. If you have any information, please contact the Stearns County Sheriff's Department at 612-251-4240 or Crime Stoppers toll free at 1-800-255-1301.

Mr. President, I thank my colleagues for their attention and would ask that various materials about this matter, newspaper stories, and information on the Jacob Wetterling Foundation, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

KIDNAPPING TORMENTS TRUSTING TOWN

(By Dirk Johnson)

ST. JOSEPH, MN, April 25.—Trevor Wetterling and his big brother, Jacob, were nearly inseparable. Where Jacob went, Trevor followed. Their parents even looked for activities that the boys could pursue separately, to foster independence.

On a Sunday night six months ago, Trevor, Jacob and another boy rode their bicycles to a neighborhood store to rent a videotape. On the way home, a man with a gun stopped the boys. He took the 11-year-old Jacob with him and told the other boys to run into the nearby woods or he would shoot them. That was the last that Trevor Wetterling has seen of his big brother.

Trevor, who is 10 years old, does not sleep well anymore. He does not want to go to school. When he is in the classroom, he does not want to participate.

"The class will be reading a story, and Trevor will say: 'Who cares about this? My brother is missing,'" said his mother, Patty Wetterling.

UNCERTAINTY OF EACH DAY

"And I don't know how to answer him," she went on her eyes welling with tears, "except to tell him that he's got to get through the fourth grade."

Getting through is about all the Wetterling family can be expected to do these days.

If there is any pain as crushing as the aduction of a child, it is the relentless, numbing anxiety that comes with the uncertainty of each day.

"I don't lose hope, but I haven't lost touch with reality either," Mrs. Wetterling said, sitting on the living room couch in the family's brick and cedar house, where outside dozens and dozens of trees are festooned with white ribbons, a symbol of hope. "But it doesn't do me any good to think of the things that could be happening to Jacob, to think that maybe he's not coming home."

Jacob Wetterling has moved off the front page. His name is mentioned less and less on the television news.

Two agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation are working virtually full time on Jacob's case, but once there were two dozen. The Stearns County Sheriff's Department has cut the number of investigators on the case to 12 from 30.

"The number of leads has decreased," said Jim Kostreba, chief deputy sheriff in Stearns County. "The number of calls has diminished."

St. Joseph, a town of about 2,500 people in the quiet farm country of southern Minnesota, is the kind of place that conjures the lower, safer, kinder vision of rural America. It is the kind of place where people often do not lock their doors; rather, it was that kind of place.

Some parents here now barely let their children out of their sight. The children, too, have become less trusting, a bit more cynical about a smile or wave from a stranger.

In fact, Patty Wetterling said she was probably more liberal with her three other children than most other parents here. "It's no good for parents to become neurotic," she said. "We can only teach our children so much. We can't take away their freedom. For a child, freedom is like food and water. Little kids shouldn't be worrying about a bad man out there somewhere. They should be chasing butterflies."

24,655 MISSING SINCE 1984

Mrs. Wetterling said it was important for children to understand that a kidnapping like Jacob's—an armed stranger lurking in the background—was not common.

Indeed, of the 24,655 children reported missing in the United States since 1984, "fewer than 1 in 25 were taken by someone other than a family member, according to the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children. Runaways are the most numerous among the missing children, followed by those taken by a family member, often a parent in a custody dispute.

The Federal Department of Justice is conducting a study on missing children, to be released next month. Among other things, it addresses whether small towns are safer from abductions that are big cities, whether regions of the country differ in the numbers of abductions and whether boys or girls are most often the target.

"We don't know yet the probabilities that are involved in child abductions," Ms. Cartwright said. "But we do know that it happens in New York City and that it happens in rural Minnesota."

Jacob's father, Jerry Wetterling, a chiropractor, did not return to work for five weeks after his son was taken. Then, for two months, he worked a half day each week. In January, he returned to work nearly full time. Mrs. Wetterling travels to give talks about missing children, and tries to keep her son's name and photograph in the public eye.

Jacob's older sister, Amy, 14, has been coping with the loss by keeping busy with school and chores, her mother said. She is getting A's, acting in a school play and helping around the house. Amy's sister, Carmen, 8, does not fully understand what has happened, Mrs. Wetterling said, yet understands some things in ways that no 8-year-old child should have to understand.

Trevor is doing the best he can. He has talked a lot with the family counselor, who has made sure to stress that Trevor should feel no guilt about what happened to Jacob, a reaction his parents had feared.

Jacob is 12 now. On his birthday, Feb. 17, hundreds of people gathered at the banks of Lake George, in nearby St. Cloud, and released balloons with handwritten messages to Jacob.

Around town nearly every mailbox is wrapped with a white ribbon. Some people have erected signs in their front yards for Jacob, or placed his picture in their windows. A sign at the local Phillips 66 gasoline station reads, "Please let Jacob come home."

The Wetterlings have received letters and calls from around the world. Someone sent a photograph of Jacob's name painted in large letters on the Berlin wall, and enclosed a chunk of the wall for Jacob when he gets home. A woman wrote of traveling in the Bahamas and entering a chapel in a tiny town where a candle burns next to a newspaper photograph of Jacob.

Canada's Prime Minister, Brian Mulroney, called Mrs. Wetterling and promised, "If he's in Canada, we'll get him home to you."

A letter from Barbara Bush arrived the other day. Mrs. Wetterling had written the President's wife, asking her to speak out for the welfare of children. "Your letter and your words of anguish over the abduction of your precious Jacob tore my heart," Mrs. Bush wrote. "Keep fighting, shouting and keep on hoping."

A $50,000 reward has been put up for Jacob's return. The boy has blue eyes, light brown hair and a mole on his left cheek. When he was taken, he weighed 75 pounds and was 5 feet tall.

"But it's been so long," Mrs. Wettering said. "I'm sure he's taller now."

U.S. RELEASES FIRST STUDY ON MISSING CHILDREN

(By Patricia Davis)

As many as 4,600 children were abducted nationwide by non-family members in 1988, and more than 100,000 were the targets of attempted abductions, primarily by passing motorists, according to the first comprehensive study of the number of children missing in the United States.

The study, released yesterday by the Justice Department, also estimated that more than 350,000 children were abducted by family members during the same time, most often in connection with child custody cases. The number was at least three times as great as previous estimates, according to the report.

Many of the abductions involving non-family members ended within hours, often after sexual assaults, but 200 to 300 children disappeared for longer periods or were killed, according to the study.

Despite widespread publicity about specific child abduction cases—including the July 1989 Northern Virginia slaying of 10-year-old Rosie Gordon and the disappearance in December of 5-year-old Melissa Brannen—efforts to develop public policy and allocate funds have been severely hampered by a lack of knowledge about the problem.

Police generally do not categorize crimes by the age of the victim, and most nationwide data on child abductions have been compiled by private child-welfare organizations.

The study, called "Missing, Abducted, Runaway, and Thrownaway Children in America," was mandated by Congress in 1984. Prepared by the Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention, it attempted to compile the number of crimes in one year against all children younger than 18.

Although most child abductions involve family members, the estimated 3,200 to 4,600 cases involving non-family members were significant, researchers and child-welfare advocates said.

"That's the size of a small town," said John Walsh; host of the TV show "America's Most Wanted" and father of Adam, the 6-year-old boy abducted from a Florida store and slain. "The Justice Department had some guts to come out and do what they did, it finally puts a handle on the fact that kids are exploited in this country."

Andrea J. Sedlak, one of three authors of the study, said yesterday that "the biggest surprise to us" was the number of children abducted by family members. Previous estimates, based primarily on guesswork, have ranged from 25,000 to 100,000, she said.

Sedlak, a social psychologist and senior study director of WESTAT, a private research firm in Rockville, said the number perhaps can be explained by the high divorce rate in the country. There were an estimated 63 million children in the country during the period studied.

In addition to the number of children abducted, Sedlak said another goal of the study was to estimate the number of runaways in 1988. For that category—the only one that previously had been scientifically studied—the estimate was nearly 450,000, representing little change since 1975, she said.

The study also looked at two distinct groups that previously have received little attention, including "thrownaways," or children who have left home involuntarily, and a group called "lost, injured or otherwise, missing," Sedlak said. The estimates for those categories were as high as 127,100 and 438,200, respectively, she said.

The study said thrownaways fell into two categories. One group, estimated in number at 127,100, had been cut off from their family in one of four ways: They had been told to leave the household; taken from the home and a caretaker refused to allow the child's return; had run away but the caretaker made no effort to recover the child; or had been abandoned or deserted.

The second group, estimated at 59,200, was without a secure and familiar place to stay during some portion of the episode, such as spending the night in a car. All abandoned children fell in this category.

"One of the most important conclusions we can draw is that missing children is not a single problem," Sedlak said. The study underscored the need to research, analyze and treat each of the five categories separately, she said.

Data for the study were collected from six sources, including a telephone survey of 34,822 randomly selected households, which yielded interviews with 10,544 caretakers about the experiences of 20,505 children. Numbers also were gleaned from a re-analysis of 12 years of FBI homicide data, and a police records study of 83 law-enforcement agencies.

The study, which was co-authored by David Finkelhor of the University of New Hamsphire and Gerald Hotaling of the University of Lowell, also said that obtaining clear figures is impeded by the lack of clearly defined crime categories. For example, definitions of abduction vary and there are no federal laws requiring reporting of the crime by age, Sedlak said.

In most family abductions, the abductors were men, non-custodial fathers and father figures. Most victims were ages 2 to 11, with slightly more at younger ages and relatively few infants and teenagers. Half the largest estimate in the this category involved unauthorized takings; the other half involved failures to return the child after an authorized visit.

Ernest E. Allen, president of the Arlington-based National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, praised the study, saying it underscores the need for a federal mandate requiring that all cases of missing children be reported. Said Allen: "This confirms the fact that American children are at risk and that we have to do more to protect them."

"This is really the first time the Justice Department has really come through in a solid way," said Sen. Paul Simon (D-Ill.), who sponsored the Missing Children's Act while in the House. "I have been prodding, but up until this point we have not had this sort of data. When you look at these numbers, you have a much more concrete feel for the kind of problems we face in the country.

Because of definitional controversies, each problem is estimated according to two possible definitions.

These estimates should not be added or aggregated.

Major Conclusions

What has in the past been called the missing children problem is in reality a set of at least five very different, distinct problems. Each of these problems needs to be researched, analyzed, and treated separately.

Many of the children in at least four of these categories were not literally missing. Caretakers did know where they were. The problem was in recovering them.

Because of definitional controversies and confusion about the concept of missing children, public policy still needs to clarify the domain of this problem. Which children and which situations should be included, what do they have in common and what are they to be called?

Family Abduction appeared to be a substantially larger problem than previously thought.

The Runaway problem did not appear to be larger in 1988 than at the time of the last national survey in 1975.

More than a fifth of the children who have previously been termed Runaways should actually be considered Thrownaways.

There were a large group of literally missing children who have not been adequately recognized by previous research and policy concerning missing children. These were children who were missing because they got lost, injured, or because they miscommunicated with caretakers about where they would be or when they would be home.

OVERALL CONCLUSIONS

NISMART drew two important conclusions concerning the overall "missing children" problem.

(1) Although the five problems studied here are often grouped together as one—"missing children"—in fact, they are extremely dissimilar social problems. They affect different children and different families. They have very different causes, different dynamics, different remedies, different policy advocates, and different types of institutions and professionals who are concerned. They could not be lumped together for meaningful scientific analysis.

(2) There was a second serious obstacle to grouping these five categories of children under the rubric "missing children": not all these children were literally missing. As the studies revealed, a large proportion of the caretakers knew where their children were most of the time during the episodes. For example, in the case of family abductions, only 17 percent of the children had their whereabouts not at all known to caretakers (see Figure RE-2). Many caretakers knew that the children were at the home of their ex-spouse, but they could not get them back. In the case of runaways from households, only 28 percent of the children were entirely missing. Most runaways were known to be a the homes of friends or relatives. Even in the case of non-family abductions, most episodes were so short-lived, as in the case of an abduction and rape, that the child may not have been missed by anyone.

Thus, we determined that it was not possible to develop a meaningful and useful global figure for the "number of missing children." First, because of the profound differences among the problems, it did not make sense from a scientific standpoint to add together such disparate episodes as runaways, stranger abducted children, parentally abducted children and so forth, or even some portion of each of these problems, into a single number of so-called missing children. Second, children in these categories were "missing" in different senses, and in many cases, as we pointed out earlier, not missing at all. Finally, when such numbers as these have been lumped together in the past, it has created a great deal of confusion. People have assumed that missing children meant children who had been abducted or who had permanently disappeared. Thus, all the statistical findings and conclusions of this study are made about the five distinct social problems, and there are no global figures. We specifically discourage anyone from trying to create or use such a global number on the basis of NISMART statistics.

RECOMMENDATIONS

(1) Public policy around what has become known as "missing children" needs to clarify its domain. It needs to be more specific about which children and which situations are included, why they are included, and what they are to be called. If the five problems studied here need an overarching framework, we propose the compound term "Missing and Displaced," rather than the simple term "Missing."

(2) Public policy needs to more clearly differentiate each of the separate social problems included under the so-called "missing children" umbrella.

(3) We recommend increased attention to the problem of Family Abduction. The incidence of this problem proved larger than earlier estimates, and its 163,200 Policy Focal cases were the most numerous of all Policy Focal categories. Family Abductions may well be on the rise and yet could be readily amenable to prevention.

(4) We recommend that all policy, publication, and research on the problem of Runaways take into account the difference between Runaways and Thrownaways. Thrownaways are a large group with different dynamics; they suffer from being lumped together indiscriminately with Runaways.

(5) We recommend special attention and an increased policy focus on the problem of children who run away from institutions. These children are among the most chronic runaways and the ones at highest risk of becoming crime victims and perpetrators; they need a specialized approach.

(6) We recommend new attention to the problems of children who fell into our category of Lost, Injured, or Otherwise Missing. This group, as numerous in total as Runaways, experienced substantially more physical harm than any other category except those who were victims of Non-Family Abductions. The 139,000 children reported to police in this category are almost as numerous as the Runaways reported to police. Some of the children in this category probably experienced quite minor episodes, but others were very serious cases. A policy about missing children needs especially to include the serious group in this category.

(7) We recommend that another set of incidence studies be undertaken 5 years from now, conducted largely along the lines of the present approach with a few modifications. These modifications would include a more comprehensive canvass of police records, a more direct sample of juvenile facilities, and a planned coordination with future child abuse and neglect incidence studies. In addition, we urge that interim methodological studies be undertaken to improve the future incidence efforts.

(8) We recommend that the Department of Justice consider the possibility of ongoing data collection systems, for example, using the National Crime Survey or a police-based "sentinel" system that could provide yearly incidence statistics for some categories of missing and displaced children.

THE JACOB WETTERLING FOUNDATION—IN SERVICE TO CHILDREN ABDUCTED BY A STRANGER

BACKGROUND

Since the National Center for Missing Children began keeping records in mid-June 1984, 871 children have been reported kidnapped or abducted by a stranger. Out of these, only 189 children have been found alive and returned to their families, 115 were found deceased, and the remaining 567 are still missing. It is unknown how many cases have gone unreported.

Specialists in the field report that the predominant motive for a stranger to abduct a child is to sexually assault the child. This danger to our children must be eliminated.

MISSION

As a non-profit organization, we have several missions: to assist and support the rescue effort, to educate the public on stranger abduction issues, to develop a national database to assist in the immediate dissemination of information when a stranger abduction occurs.

RESCUE

Once an abduction has occurred, authorities agree that time is the most critical element. All participating organizations must be mobilized within minutes of the abduction. A key element is the immediate dissemination of information about the abduction and accompanying photographs and visuals to enhance identification and apprehension, and secure the safe return of the child.

The Jacob Wetterling Foundation may assist in the investigation as a member of the rescue team—enhancing the flow of information to the media thereby gaining valuable leads for the investigation. Our track record in gaining leads for investigators is outstanding.

EDUCATION

Education can play a significant role in reducing the chance of stranger child abductions. Children can learn ways to correctly respond to stranger intrusions, adults can learn what situations and freedoms are age appropriate for their children, and workshops and seminars can be given to organizations and agencies who work with child abduction events.

Our education programs will reach out to these specific groups:

Children, especially ages 5 to 15,

School teachers and administrators,

Adults,

Service organizations, and related agencies,

Law enforcement professionals

Where appropriate, materials will be developed for each of these groups which will address the various stages of the abduction process: pre-abduction, abduction event, post-abduction.

Indeed, there are many victims where an abduction takes place: the abducted child, family, friends, schools, community, and the region around where the abduction took place. Programs and materials need to be developed to help people deal with the issues related to their feelings, safety, there sense of loss, and the investigative process.

PUBLICITY

Aside from law enforcement investigative process, publicity is the next most critical element to rescuing an abducted child.

During the movement of the child from place to place, there is a chance that an innocent observer may come in contact with or see the abducted child or his abductor. If that observer has had prior exposure to photographs, illustrations, or descriptions of the child or the abductor, then they will be equipped to respond to authorities. Proper communications will alert the public of the abduction event, the victim and suspect, and call them into action.

The Jacob Wetterling Foundation has both the experience and the contact network to be effective in this area. The Foundation's ability to interest and sustain media coverage of a stranger abduction event is unprecedented.

INFORMATION SERVICES

With time being such a critical element in the rescue of an abducted child, it is imperative that the picture of the abducted child and any suspects be distributed in a consistent and methodological manner: first with broad local coverage, to regional coverage, then to national and international coverage as the investigation dictates.

The need for highly developed databases of: every local, regional and national law enforcement office; road-side rest stations, gas stations, and convenience stores; hotel and motel locations, however remote—all points of contact that an abductor may come in contact with as he may move the child around in an attempt to avoid apprehension—all should be a ready point of contact within minutes of an abduction.

HATCH ACT REFORM AMENDMENTS OF 1989

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I am convinced that America's civil service is the best in the world. while there are isolated instances of corruption, on the whole our Nation is not plagued with the public corruption endemic to so many other nations.

Nonetheless, Mr. President, I regret that the bill now pending would tear down one of the pillars on which the integrity of the civil service has been built. In fact, the very success of the Hatch Act in eliminating political corruption from the Federal work force has led this bill's proponents to assume that it is now safe to essentially do away with it.

I do not doubt their sincerity, but they are making a grave mistake. While science and the times may change, human nature does not. The prevalence of political corruption in the 1930's made obvious the necessity of the Hatch Act's enactment then; it should now warn us just as clearly that it would be unwise to repeal or modify it. Public corruption will not revisit America tomorrow if we do, but it is certain to resurface much more quickly than the years that were required to eradicate it.

Mr. President, I feel it is important to emphasize what Federal employees can and cannot do under current law.

Under the Hatch Act Federal employees may: Frist, register to vote; second, voluntarily contribute money to partisan political candidates; third, attend political conventions as spectators; fourth, assist in voter registration drives; fifth, participate as election judges or poll watchers; sixth, attend political fundraising events; seventh, wear political buttons off duty; and eighth, run as nonaffiliated candiates in partisan elections in areas with high concentrations of federal employees.

The Hatch Act does prevent a Federal employee from taking an active role in partisan political activities. He or she cannot: First, run as a partisan political candidate for public office; second, hold office in a political party; third, solicit or handle political contributions; fourth, organize partisan political fundraising activities; fifth, make partisan political speeches for candidates; sixth, work in the political campaign of a partisan candidate; and seventh, pass out partisan political campaign literature.

Mr. President, almost nothing has been said in this debate about the fact that in exchange for imposing restrictions on Federal employees' engaging in partisan political activities, the Federal Government has in turn guaranteed career civil service employees that they may not be fired for partisan political reasons.

Are the two unavoidably linked? If Federal employees really demand unfettered participation in the political process—in effect to campaign for candidates whom they prefer to be their superiors—and against those they do not want—then should they not be prepared to accept an equally unfettered political process whereby those whom they opposed in the political campaign may dismiss them when elected, if elected?

Mr. President, the real question here is whether the spoils system is to be resurrected. Have we forgotten history? Do we not know that such a system led to graft and corruption within government? I do not want to return to the days of the spoils system, but neither do I want to enter a new era where Federal employees can participate in political and emotional campaigns against their elected superiors and then have the public expect that their performance on the job—as well as their service to the public—will not be affected if and when they lose. That is too much to expect of human nature.

For instance, what President could have confidence that his policies will be faithfully carried out by a Federal agency when the agency's senior executives were prominent supporters of his political opponent?

Mr. President, while I am opposed to this particular bill, I am not insensitive to the concerns of the many Government workers who have discussed this issue with me. I am convinced that a compromise can be worked out where they could participate in political campaigns by distributing literature off the job and various other specified activities.

However, I cannot—as this bill does—endorse the concept that Federal employees may: First, hold office in either of the political parties; second, solicit or handle political contributions from either the public or their coworkers; or third, make public speeches in support of partisan candidates so that the public confuses the Federal employees' political views off the job with their official duties on the job.

I reiterate, I am not opposed to some relaxation of the Hatch Act, but the pending bill is just too one sided. For example, under this bill Federal employees would be allowed to solicit political contributions only—repeat: only—for the Political Action Committees [PAC's] of Federal employee unions. As Al Smith used to say: Look at the record. Clearly, the Federal employee unions have never distributed PAC funds on a nonpartisan basis.

Mr. President, the proponents of the pending bill seek to enable the various unions to raise funds from the Federal work force for partisan political purposes even as they argue that Federal employees no longer need to fear such political coercion. It is precisely that kind of coercion that led to the enactment of the Hatch Act in the first place.

As a result, employee unions, will be allowed to pressure Federal employees for partisan campaign purposes. The bottom line is that Federal employees will once again be pressured for political purposes, and, presto: The spoils system is back again in full force.

Mr. President, we need to remember that in addition to protecting individual Federal employees from political coercion, the Hatch Act serves to protect the general public from political intimidation by a politically partisan Federal bureaucracy. It is significant that the most egregious public corruption in the 1930's occurred in a Federal benefit program—the Works Progress Administration—where what amounted to a public assistance job was jeopardized when individuals did not support—with their time as well as their money—candidates endorsed by their superiors.

As John R. Bolton wrote in his article, "The Hatch Act, a Civil Libertarian Defense":

> Government workers have a right to be free from political coercion—particularly from any systematic solicitation by either their superior or their co-workers. Since the power the coerce derives in substantial amount from the power vested in government, the Hatch Act is, in effect, a case of the government restraining itself. Non-governmental employees have similar First Amendment rights—the right not to have their freedom to engage in political activity "chilled" by political activists who also administer government programs and regulatory law-enforcement agencies. The most acute government responsibility is that government not allow itself to be used to skew the political process.

Mr. President, Congressman J. Will Taylor of Tennessee stated, during the original Hatch Act in 1939:

> No one in this country ever dreamed that the time would come in the United States when public money, appropriated for the alleviation of human distress, could be sabotaged and prostituted as it was [to extort votes] * * * to a greater or lesser degree in every State in the Union.

Mr. President, just as no one dreamed it could happen then, no one dreams that it can happen now. But, Mr. President, I know that just as it did in fact happen 50 years ago, it will happen again if we pass this bill.

Mr. President, ultimately this bill and the Hatch Act are about preserving a free ballot. This bill as currently written threatens it while the Hatch Act currently protects it. Therefore, I urge Senators to vote for a free ballot and against this bill as now written.

The bottom line is this: The pending bill and the Hatch Act—which this bill would gut—raise the question of whether Congress wants to preserve the free ballot. This bill, as currently written, threatens it. The Hatch Act protects it. Therefore, I hope Senators will vote for a free ballot and against this bill.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. LIEBERMAN:

S. 2582. A bill to amend the act entitled "An Act to extend the Wetlands Loan Act" to provide for the expansion of the Stewart B. McKinney National Wildlife Refuge; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

CONNECTICUT COASTAL PROTECTION ACT OF 1990

● Mr. LIEBERMAN. Mr. President, the late Congressman Stewart B. McKinney considered his successful efforts to protect Connecticut's shoreline among his most important accomplishments. Today, I am introducing legislation which would expand what is now known as the Stewart B. McKinney National Wildlife Refuge, a series of islands, preserved wetlands and nesting areas in Long Island Sound, by approximately 1,000 acres.

At 338 acres, the McKinney Refuge is the smallest in the country, and yet because of its position in the East Coast Flyway, it is one of the most important. To Milford Point, Sheffield, Chimon, and Falkner islands, the legislation would add 690 acres known as the Great Meadows Marsh, in Stratford, CT; 230 acres at the Menunketesuck River marsh and Menunketesuck Island in Westbrook, CT; and approximately 80 acres in the vicinity of Norwalk Harbor in Norwalk, CT. In addition, this legislation would enable the Secretary of the Interior to manage the Salt Meadow National Wildlife Refuge as an element of the Stewart B. McKinney National Wildlife Refuge.

Newly protected as a result of this bill will be salt marsh, barrier beach, freshwater wetlands, uplands and several coastal islands. Waterfowl, shore birds, wading birds, and songbirds, including several federally and State listed threatened and endangered species rely on these habitats in the face of the rapid development of Connecticut's shoreline. In addition, the salt marshes of this proposed expansion support 23 species of finfish. Offshore shellfish beds in all of the proposed areas support oysters, quahogs, clams, mussels—an important and abundant food supply for many migratory birds.

The U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service supports this expansion. Its environmental assessment of the areas in question, published last November, recommended inclusion of all the areas listed above. The Nature Conservancy has worked closely with the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service to assemble many of the parcels currently in the refuge, and has pledged to assist the Service in the protection of these new areas.

The consolidation of the Salt Meadow and McKinney refuges will make the entire ecosystem easier to manage. Last year, the Interior appropriations bill dedicated $630,000 for the purpose of building a headquarters and visiting center for the McKinney refuge. Once complete, and if this legislation passes, the McKinney and Salt Meadow refuges will be managed on site, rather than as they are now, from facilities in Rhode Island.

The protection, preservation, and wise management of our Nation's natural resources is one of our greatest responsibilities as legislators. I urge my colleagues to support this contribution toward that objective. As Congressman McKinney was known to say, "a victory for nature is a victory for us all."

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of this bill be printed in the RECORD immediately following my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2583. A bill to provide that taxpayers may rely on Internal Revenue Service guidelines in determining the funding limits for pension plans; to the Committee on Finance.

SMALL PENSION PLANS

● Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce legislation which, if enacted, will prevent certain audit practices of the Internal Revenue Service. If these practices remain unchecked, it could result in the termination of thousands of small business defined benefit plans.

Mr. President, as a small businessman and the ranking member of the Senate Small Business Committee, I have for some time been concerned that Federal legislation and accompanying regulations slowly but surely are forcing small business owners to terminate their pension plans. I hear regularly from constituents and their accountants about the burdens imposed under Federal law simply to keep an existing plan in place. What with complicated paperwork and expensive and time-consuming filing requirements, it's surprising that small businesses even attempt to keep up.

Although, I believe that the IRS should prevent abuse of the Tax Code by all taxpayers, I am not supportive of retroactive changes in audit standards which have the effect of placing thousands of plans sponsored by small businesses at risk.

The legislation I am introducing today targets practices which lack regulatory authorization and conflict with the past policies of the IRS. In essence, small businesses are being targeted for audits under new IRS policies which are being applied retroactively. These audits will be expensive and time consuming. Many small businesses lack the resources to fight back.

Let me summarize the issue: Federal standards for defined benefit plans have been developed over a period of about 15 years through IRS revenue rulings, notices, and regulations. These standards are found in the audit guidelines which were issued by the IRS in 1984. Now, these longstanding guidelines are being scrapped, at least for small businesses. And new guidelines, developed without benefit of any public comment or congressional involvement, are being applied retroactively.

Currently, when an employer establishes a defined benefit plan, it is obligated to pay each eligible employee a predetermined benefit when the employee retires, dies, becomes disabled, or terminates employment. Given that, the employer assumes the entire burden of being able to meet the actuarial assumptions of the plan; it bears responsibility for assuring that sufficient funds are invested in the plan to assure that the specified benefit will be available as employees retire.

For about the past 15 years, the IRS has taken the position that actuarial assumptions must be reasonable; an interest rate of 5 to 6 percent and estimated retirement age of 55 has been held to satisfy this requirement. Now, the IRS has unilaterally altered its standard and requires an assumed interest rate of 8 percent and retirement age of 65. The obvious implication of doing so will be to reduce the deduction claimed by businesses arising from mandatory plan contributions, resulting in an increase in Federal tax revenues.

Mr. President, the bill I am introducing today is very simple. It simply provides that if a small business relies on the actuarial guidelines promulgated by the IRS, such assumptions shall be deemed reasonable until such time as they are formally amended. Presumably, in the event of amendment, small businesses will be invited to submit comments about the changes in advance. Unilateral, unpublicized changes are so destructive and instill distrust in American citizens regarding the operations of the Federal Government, including the Internal Revenue Service.

I want to thank the small business organizations who have brought this issue to the attention of the Senate. I look forward to pursuing this subject through hearings in the Small Business Committee and, hopefully, here on the floor of the Senate.

I ask unanimous consent that the full text of my legislation be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my statement.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2583

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

(a) GUIDELINES FOR ACTUARIAL ASSUMPTIONS.—For purposes of section 412(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 and section 302(c)(3) of the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 (29 U.S.C. 1082(c)(3)), actuarial assumptions used by a plan shall be treated as reasonable if such assumptions are within the guidelines set forth in the Actuarial Guidelines Handbook (Internal Revenue Manual 7(10)5(10), as in effect on December 12, 1984).

(b) PERIOD PROVISION IN EFFECT.—The provisions of subsection (a) shall apply for all plan years ending after December 12, 1984, and beginning before such time as modifications to the guidelines become final; provided that such modifications shall be applied prospectively.

(c) RELIANCE ON PROFESSIONAL GUIDANCE.—If a plan lacks sufficient experience to fall within the purview of the Actuarial Audit Guidelines Handbook, then deference shall be given to the judgment of the plan's Enrolled Actuary with respect to the selection of the actuarial assumption.●

By Mr. BOREN (for himself, Mr. SYMMS, Mr. PRYOR, Mr. CHAFEE, and Mr. WALLOP):

S. 2584. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 to provide that the deduction for State and local income and franchise taxes shall not be allocated to foreign source income; to the Committee on Finance.

ALLOCATION OF DEDUCTION FOR STATE AND LOCAL INCOME AND FRANCHISE TAXES

● Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, the ability of American businesses to compete with their foreign counterparts is the greatest challenge facing them today in the world marketplace. There have been no shortage of speeches and hearings in Congress about this problem. There has, however, been a shortage of meaningful action. As Congress debates what more might be done, rules and regulations impose additional costs on U.S. businesses competing in the world marketplace.

In response to this situation, today I am introducing legislation along with my colleagues Senators SYMMS, PRYOR CHAFEE, and WALLOP, which provides that U.S. corporations can allocate all deductions for State and local franchise taxes to U.S. source income.

The IRS, after several major changes in position, is requiring U.S. multinationals to allocate a portion of their deduction for State taxes to foreign source income. IRS regulations on this matter were first issued in 1977. Then, a 1979 revenue ruling interpreting those regulations held that a franchise tax measured by income should not be allocated to foreign source income, because it is the cost of the "privilege of doing business" in the State. However, in 1987, this ruling was reversed, retroactively for U.S. corporations and prospectively for foreign corporations. Finally, in December 1988, the IRS issued new regulations, retroactive to 1977, requiring even more extensive allocation of State tax to foreign source income. These regulations have been severely criticized by many taxpayers and States. Nevertheless, the IRS is considering finalizing them.

The IRS position adversely impacts the competitiveness of the U.S. multinationals in world markets. U.S. corporations competing with foreign corporations have an additional cost of doing business when they are in effect, unable to fully deduct their State income taxes. Their foreign competitors operating in the United States, however, are generaly able to obtain the full credit the deduction for State taxes.

The IRS position inequitably subjects U.S. multinationals to inconsistent taxing regimes. States, which are constitutionally prohibited from taxing income attributable to foreign activities, believe they are taxing income attributable to in-State activities. The Supreme Court has affirmed this belief in the face of taxpayer challenges to State taxes. This IRS position, however, is that States are taxing foreign source income. U.S. multinationals are caught in the middle. They are subject to State tax on the grounds the tax is not on foreign source income, but are required to allocate a portion of the tax on the grounds that the tax is on foreign source income. This inconsistent treatment is unjustified and needs to be resolved.

The problems cause by the IRS positions are particularly acute for taxpayers with business operations in States using a factor formula method of taxation. Corporations operating in these States have higher after-tax costs than their competitors operating in other States. The IRS position, therefore, discriminates among State base on their method of taxation.

The legislation I am introducing today solves the problems of the IRS position by providing that all deductions for State and local income and franchise taxes are allocated to U.S. source income for foreign tax credit purposes. The legislation will, in effect, give full deduction for State income taxes, relieve the inequity of subjecting taxpayers to inconsistent taxing regimes, and improve the competitiveness of U.S. multinationals.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2584

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled.

SECTION 1. ALLOCATION OF DEDUCTION FOR STATE AND LOCAL INCOME AND FRANCHSE TAXES FOR FOREIGN TAX CREDIT PURPOSES.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Subsection (b) of section 904 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 (relating to taxable income for purpose of computing limitation) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(5) DEDUCTION FOR STATE AND LOCAL INCOME AND FRANCHISE TAXES.—For purposes of computing taxable income under this subpart, and deduction for any State and local income or franchise tax shall not be allocated or apportioned to gross income from sources without the United States."

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made by this section shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1976.●

"(2) No employee of the Internal Revenue Service, the Department of Justice, the Federal Election Commission, or the Central Intelligence Agency (except one appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate), may take an active part in political management or political campaigns.

"(3) For purposes of this subsection, the term 'active part in political management or in a political campaign' means those acts of political management or political campaigning which were prohibited for employees of the competitive service before July 19, 1940, by determinations of the Civil Service Commission under the rules prescribed by the President.

KENNEDY (AND OTHERS) AMENDMENT NO. 1589

"(ii) In the event that the payments made under subparagraph (B) in any fiscal year are less than $25,000,000, such remaining funds as do not exceed $25,000,000 shall remain available until expended for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of subparagraph (B). Such remaining funds shall not be considered part of the funds reserved to make payments under subparagraph (B), but shall be expended if funds in excess of $25,000,000 are needed to carry out the provisions of subparagraph (B) in any fiscal year.

"(iii) If for any fiscal year the total amount of payments to be made under subparagraph (B) exceeds $25,000,000 and the funds described in clause (ii) are insufficient to make such payments, then the provisions of clause (i) shall not apply.".

(2) Subparagraph (B) of section 2(b)(2) of Public Law 101-26 is hereby repealed, and Public Law 81-874 shall be applied and administered as if such subparagraph (B) (and the amendment made by such subparagraph) had not been enacted.

"(e)(1) Whenever the Secretary of Education determines that—

"(A) for any fiscal year, the number of children determined with respect to any local educational agency under subsections (a) and (b) is less than 90 percent of the number so determined with respect to such agency during the preceding fiscal year;

"(B) there has been a decrease or cessation of Federal activities within the State in which such agency is located; and

"(C) such decrease or cessation has resulted in a substantial decrease in the number of children determined under subsections (a) and (b) with respect to such agency for such fiscal year;

the amount to which such agency is entitled for such fiscal year and for any of the 3 succeeding fiscal years shall not be less than 90 percent of the payment such agency received under subsections (a) and (b) for the preceding fiscal year.

"(2) There is authorized to be appropriated for each fiscal year such amount as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this section, which remain available until expended.

"(a) APPLICATIONS.—(1) Any local educational agency desiring to receive the payments to which it is entitled for any fiscal year under sections 2, 3, or 4 shall submit an application therefor to the Secretary and file a copy with the State educational agency. Each such application shall be submitted in such form, and containing such information, as the Secretary may reasonably require to determine whether such agency is entitled to a payment under any of such sections and the amount of any such payment.

"(2) The Secretary shall establish a deadline for the receipt of applications. For each fiscal year beginning with fiscal year 1991, the Secretary shall accept an approvable application received up to 60 days after the deadline, but shall reduce the payment based on such late application by 10 percent of the amount that would otherwise be paid. The Secretary shall not accept or approve any application submitted more than 60 days after the application deadline.

"(3) Notwithstanding any other provision of law or regulation, a State educational agency that had been accepted as an application for funds under section 3 for fiscal years 1985, 1986, 1987 and 1988 shall be permitted to continue as an applicant under the same conditions by which it made application during such fiscal years only if such State educational agency distributes all funds received for the students for which application is being made by such State educational agency to the local educational agencies providing educational services to such students.".

(d) ADJUSTMENTS.—Section 5(c)(2) of Public Law 81-874 is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following new subparagraph:

(e) SPECIAL RULE.—The Secretary of Education shall consider as timely filed, and shall process for payment, an application from a local educational agency that is eligible to receive the payments to which it is entitled in fiscal year 1990 under section 2 or 3 of the Act, if the Secretary receives the application by June 29, 1990, and the application is otherwise approvable.

(f) DEFINITION.—Section 403(6) of Public Law 81-874 is amended by inserting the following new sentences at the end thereof: "Such term does not include any agency or school authority that the Secretary determines, on a case-by-case basis—

"(A) was constituted or reconstituted primarily for the purpose of receiving assistance under this Act or increasing the amount of that assistance;

"(B) is not constituted or reconstituted for legitimate educational purposes; or

"(C) was previously part of a school district upon being constituted or reconstituted.

For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of section 3(a), such term includes any agency or school authority that has had an arrangement with a nonadjacent school district for the education of children of persons who reside or work on an installation of the Department of Defense for more than 25 years, but only if the Secretary determines that there is no single school distict adjacent to the school district in which the installation is located that is capable of educating all such children.".

SEC. . THE HEAD START ACT AND CHAPTER 1 OF TITLE I OF THE ELEMENTARY AND SECONDARY EDUCATION ACT OF 1965.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Senate finds that—

(1) one in every five children in America, some 12,600,000 youngsters under the age of 18, live in poverty;

(2) the Head Start program and programs under chapter 1 of title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 are proven early education programs that offer the best opportunity to break the cycle of poverty;

(3) since 1980, spending by the Federal Government for education has decreased by 4.7 percent in real terms;

(4) $1 invested in high-quality preschool programs like Head Start and chapter 1 of title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 saves $6 in lowered costs for special education, grade retention, public assistance, and crime;

(5) children who enroll in Head Start are more likely than other poor children to be literate, employed, and enrolled in postsecondary education;

(6) children who enroll in Head Start programs are less likely than other poor children to be high school dropouts, teen parents, dependent on welfare, or arrested for criminal or delinquent activity;

(7) children who enroll in programs under chapter 1 of title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 experience larger increases in standardized achievement scores than comparable students who did not enroll in such programs;

(8) low funding levels for the Head Start Act limit the participation in Head Start programs to less than 20 percent of the eligible population; and

(9) low funding levels for chapter 1 and title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 limit participation in programs assisted under such Act to less than 50 percent of the eligible population.

(b) SENSE OF SENATE.—It is the sense of the Senate that appropriations for the Head Start Act should be increased to fully serve the potential, eligible population under such Act by fiscal year 1994 and that appropriations for chapter 1 of title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 should be increased to the authorization level of such Act by fiscal year 1994.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

REGARDING THE DEPARTURE OF ROBERT L. BENDICK FROM THE DEPARTMENT OF ENVIRONMENTAL MANAGEMENT

● Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I would like to take a moment to pay tribute to an outstanding public servant, who has been a primary force in the protection of the environment in Rhode Island. I am referring to Robert L. Bendick, who has been the director of the Rhode Island Department of Environmental Management since 1982. Bob will be leaving DEM to take a position with the State of New York.

Over the past two decades Bob Bendick and I have worked together on environmental issues in nearly every corner of the State. Bob has a vision, a vision of open fields and well planned cities, and of bays and rivers free from pollution.

Unlike many others, Bob has acted on his vision, and worked tirelessly to turn it into reality. An example is Bob's work along the Blackstone River. Bob started the effort to protect the environmental and historical importance of the Blackstone River nearly 20 years ago while he was a planner in Woonsocket. I worked closely with Bob to develop and introduce national legislation to create the Blackstone River Valley National Heritage Corridor. Due largely to his efforts and the passage of this legislation, the Blackstone is being transformed into a place where visitors can enjoy the natural environment in the midst of an urban setting.

Rhode Island has done more on open space protection than any other State in the country, and much of the credit for this belongs to Bob Bendick. On a per capita basis, Rhode Island spends more on preserving open space than any other State. In just the past 4 years, Rhode Islanders have approved the expenditure of over $200 million for open space protection and recreation development.

Equally, Bob has had a great deal to do with the improvement of Narragansett Bay. Just a few years ago the bay was threatened with irreversible contamination. His work in establishing the bay as a national estuary and the creation and development of the Narragansett Bay Project has been crucial to the bay's resurgence. During the last 5 years, under Bob's direction, Narragansett Bay has made great strides. According to the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency, over 90 percent of Narragansett Bay is swimable and fishable. According to DEM data, five major wastewater treatment facilities achieved a dramatic decrease in conventional pollutants being discharged into Narragansett Bay. In 1988, more than $22.9 million in Federal and State funds were spent on municipal wastewater treatment facilities. Bob has been a leader in these efforts.

Also Bob was instrumental in establishing Rhode Island as a leader in solid waste management. Presently, more than one-third of the State is participating in a source separation program, and by the end of this year more than 60 percent of the State will be recycling its solid waste. This innovative program would not have been realized without the efforts of Bob Bendick.

Rhode Island owes Bob Bendick a debt of gratitude. He is leaving Rhode Island a healthier, more environmentally sound place than he found it, and for that, we deeply grateful.●

JACK W. CARLSON, SMALL BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION'S MINNESOTA ACCOUNTANT ADVOCATE

● Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I would like to take this opportunity to say a few words about a fine business leader who has devoted many years assisting in the development and growth of small businesses. I am speaking of Jack W. Carlson, attorney with the Thomsen-Nybeck law firm.

Mr. Carlson has just been chosen as the Small Business Administration's Minnesota District Accountant Advocate of 1990. For many years, Jack has selflessly given of his time and expertise to various community and civic activities geared toward promoting small business. Jack's expertise in tax and financial matters has been an invaluable asset to those whom he counsels on a voluntary basis.

Mr. Carlson espouses the entrepreneurial spirit that is so necessary to establishing and developing a successful small business. His commitment and contribution to the community is being recognized today as he is chosen as the Small Business Administration's Minnesota District Accountant Advocate of the Year 1990. I congratulate him for his efforts and wish him continued success.●

NATIONAL NURSES' DAY

● Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I rise today to briefly share with my colleagues the deep respect I have for this Nation's 2 million registered nurses. The National Nurses' Association has declared today National Nurses' Day, and I think the true footsoldiers of health care across this country deserve our recognition.

As health care professionals, nurses are on the front of the frontlines. We may hear the statistics of increasing gunshot wounds, drug addiction, and child abuse, but nurses see those statistics in individual human lives.

Mr. President, nurses see the individual human faces of suffering every single day. They know the handicapped child whose mother could not afford proper prenatal care, the mentally ill person whose life on the street has led to disease and malnutrition, and the Alzheimer's victim left unsure what to do when she fell on the ice. Nurses bring their professional skills to bear, but they also bring their compassion to bear on those individual people and millions more.

Within the next decade, we will need an additional 600,000 nurses in hospitals and a wide variety of nonhospital settings. In the months and years ahead, we no doubt will consider various Federal and State initiatives to encourage more young men and women to choose a career in nursing. But today, I rise simply to offer my deep gratitude and respect to those who already have.●

DONALD E. BERG, SMALL BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION'S MINNESOTA ACCOUNTANT ADVOCATE

● Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I would like to take this opportunity to say a few words about a fine business leader who has devoted many years assisting in the development and growth of small businesses. I am speaking of Donald E. Berg, audit partner with KPMG Peat Marwick.

Mr. Berg has just been chosen as the Small Business Administration's Minnesota District Accountant Advocate of 1990. For many years Don has devoted his time and energy to promoting small businesses, especially those engaged in high technology, health care, and medical technology. In 1984 Don was one of the founders of the well-respected Medical Alley Association. This association has promoted interest and investment in Minnesota as a major center of health care research and innovation.

Mr. Berg espouses the entrepreneurial spirit that is so necessary to establishing and developing a successful small business. His commitment and contributions to the advancement of small business is being recognized today as he is chosen as the Small Business Administration's Minnesota District Accountant Advocate of the Year 1990. I congratulate him for his efforts and wish him continued success.●

FORMER MEMBER OF CONGRESS SAMUEL H. YOUNG ENDORSES CONGRESSIONAL TERM LIMITATION

● Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, many people argue that lack of aggressive, inspiring challengers are a big reason why voters do not turn out at the polls and why today's incumbents spend so much time in office.

Unfortunately, this argument simply does not hold water. If challengers are so lacking, why do incumbents barrage their districts and States with franked, mass mailings in an election year? Why are huge campaign war chests amassed prior to every election cycle?

The reason is that incumbents need these resources to entrench themselves. Job security is a natural craving, and today's Members see their public service as a career. Consequently they utilize any possible tools to cling to office, and unfortunately they have stacked the deck in their favor. Eager staff, easy media access, the frank, pork barrelling all add up to a permanence of 98.5 percent in the House.

If a good person wishes to serve, he or she is effectively prohibited. It is no surprise that Texas alone has 12 out of 27 uncontested House races this year.

As public servants, we have to realize that careerism undermines our mission. Term limitation will eliminate the need to ensure reelection, and thereby allow each Member to exercise the political courage and intellectual honesty our Nation's problems so desperately need.

I ask that a letter I have recently received from former Member Samuel H. Young be printed in the RECORD immediately following my remarks.

The letter follows:

LAW OFFICES,
SAMUEL H. YOUNG,
Lincolnwood, IL, April 15, 1990.

Re constitutional amendment limiting congressional terms—S.J. Res. 235.

Hon. GORDON J. HUMPHREY,
U.S. Senate, Hart Senate Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR HUMPHREY: May I acknowledge your recent letter concerning the proposed constitutional amendment to limit terms that persons may serve in the U.S. Congress.

I strongly support your Joint Resolution and the proposed amendment.

Limiting the terms of Congressmen to 12 years in the House and 12 years in the Senate will be a tremendous step toward a more responsive and democratic Congress. It will help preserve the citizen legislator attitude of Congressional members, and it will decrease the motivation to continually increase the size and amount of staff personnel and office expenditures.

Please use my name in support of such S.J. Res. 235. You may also note that I am a former Member of Congress from the 10th Congressional District of Illinois serving in the 1973-1974 Congress.

Yours truly,

SAMUEL H. YOUNG.●

JOHN H. STOUT, SMALL BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION'S MINNESOTA MINORITY BUSINESS ADVOCATE

● Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I would like to take this opportunity to say a few words about a fine business leader who has devoted many years assisting in the development and growth of minority-owned small businesses. I am speaking of John H. Stout, attorney with Fredrikson & Byron law firm.

Mr. Stout has just been chosen as the Small Business Administration's Minnesota District Minority Business Advocate of 1990. For many years John has made a commitment to the development and success of minority-owned businesses. Through his efforts with the Metropolitan Economic Development Association, John was instrumental in assisting in the formation of the Milestone Growth Fund, a venture capital fund that invests in minority-owned businesses. Mr. Stout serves as chairman of the board.

Mr. Stout espouses the entrepreneurial spirit that is so necessary to establishing and developing a successful small business. His commitment and contribution to the community is being recognized today as he is chosen as the Small Business Administration's Minnesota District Minority Business Advocate of the year 1990. I congratulate him for his efforts and wish him continued success.●

● Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I rise today to give special mention to National Nurses' Day, an event which recognizes the care, competence, and compassion provided by our Nation's 2 million registered nurses, including the 40,000 in my home State of Minnesota.

During a time when many Americans say they are dissatisfied with our health care system, I hope they still appreciate the outstanding level of nursing care they receive in this country. During my Senate career, I have come to appreciate nursing as the glue which holds our fragmented health system together for patients, physicians, and other health professionals. I look to the nursing profession to help us in Congress find innovative ways to improve access to health care while controlling costs.

Mr. President, I would also like to give special mention to the Minnesota Nursing Task Force Group, which I formed in 1989. This group is comprised of Barbara O'Grady of Waterville, MN, Sharon Price Aadalen of St. Paul, Marliyn Molen of East St. Paul, Barb Tebbitt or Shoreview, Dodie Russell of St. Paul, Sonya Meyerholz of St. Paul, Annette McBeth of Mankato, Mary Balzer of St. Paul, Jeannine Bayard of St. Paul, Marge Jamieson of St. Paul, LaVohn Josten of Minneapolis, Sue Stout of St. Paul, Gayle Hansen of Fairmont, Betty Sheppard of Willmar, and Bernadine Feldman of Minneapolis.

The task force has both educated me about advances in nursing and given me a vision of how nursing—working with physicians and community leaders—can improve our health care system. I am pleased to note that this group is developing a community based model for acute and long-term nursing care which will be managed by nurse practitioners and block nurses. My hope is that this managed care model can be used in medically underserved areas throughout the country.

Mr. President, in closing, I want to thank our Nation's registered nurses for their professionalism, their contributions to health care in this country, and their ability to continually adapt to their evolving role in health care delivery.●

FRANK KILIBARDA, SR., SMALL BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION'S MINNESOTA EXPORTER OF THE YEAR

● Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I would like to take this opportunity to say a few words about a fine business leader who has devoted many years in the community of Mankato, MN, building and expanding his export business. I am speaking of Frank Kilibarda, Sr., president of Minnesota Hardwoods, Inc.

Mr. Kilibarda, Sr., has just been chosen as the Small Business Administration's Minnesota District Exporter of the Year. Through hard work and determination, Frank's company has experienced a 600-percent growth in export sales since 1986. This growth has had a postive impact on the economic environment in Mankato by a doubling of employment at Frank's company.

Mr. Kilibarda, Sr., espouses the entrepreneurial spirit that is so necessary to establishing and developing a successful small business. His commitment and contribution to the community is being recognized today as he is chosen as the Small Business Administration's Minnesota District Exporter of the Year. I congratulate him for his efforts and wish him continued success.●

HIGH SCORES FOR AMERICAN COLLEGE TESTING IN WISCONSIN

● Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, it is with great pride that I rise today to give high—and well-deserved—praise to the students in my home State of Wisconsin. The students in Wisconsin have once again outperformed students in all other States on American College Testing [ACT] test scores.

Over the last several years, Wisconsin students have consistently worked hard to achieve high ACT scores. In 1987, Wisconsin took the top spot for the highest average test score on the ACT. In 1988, Iowa held first place, with Wisconsin trailing slightly. Last year, and once again this year, Wisconsin tied for first place with Iowa.

Mr. President, the schoolteachers, school administrators, and parents of Wisconsin deserve a lot of credit for this outstanding achievement. This is yet another example of how strong parental guidance, community and school support produce excellent results. And they have certainly made Wisconsin a model of excellence for America's schools.

Finally, Mr. President, let me repeat how proud I am of the outstanding job our students have done. These students are being the best they can be—so once again, hats off to them.●

JILL J. JOHNSON, SMALL BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION'S MINNESOTA YOUNG ENTREPRENEUR

● Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I would like to take this opportunity to say a few words about a fine business leader who exemplifies the American entrepreneurial spirit that is so essential to the development and growth of small business. I am speaking of Jill Johnson, owner of Johnson Consulting Services.

Ms. Johnson has just been chosen as the Small Business Administration's Minnesota District Young Entrepreneur of 1990. In 1987, Jill founded Johnson Consulting Services, specializing in business planning, market research and strategic development. With hard work and determination, Jill's company has shown a profit every year since it has opened its doors. That is quite an achievement and I commend her for her success.

Jill willingly shares her business knowledge with other aspiring entrepreneurs. Her commitment and contribution to the advance of small business is being recognized today as she is chosen as the Small Business Administration's Minnesota District Young Entrepreneur of the Year 1990. I congratulate her for her efforts and wish her continued success.●

RETIREMENT OF REV. DR. ROGER MARLIN STRESSMAN

● Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I rise today to commemorate the work of one of Nevada's outstanding citizens. Since the Reverend Dr. Roger Marlin Stressman entered the ministry 48 years ago, he has been offering guidance and support to people throughout the country. Now, upon his retirement, I want to thank Reverend Stressman for the wisdom, dedication, and love he has shown over the years to all those he has known and counseled.

Reverend Stressman was the first-ever district superintendent of the United Methodist Church in Nevada, and formed the north district which includes northern Arizona, eastern California, and southern Nevada. Consequently, though we in Las Vegas have only had the privilege of knowing the Reverend and his wife, Jane, since 1985, he has had a tremendous impact on our community.

Mr. President, the Reverend Dr. Stressman served his Lord, his parishioners, and his community faithfully, with great love and dedication. On behalf of all those who know him personally and even those who may not be aware of his impact, I thank the Reverend and his family for joining our community and helping to make it as healthy and prosperous as it is.●

THE 40TH ANNIVERSARY OF MARYMOUNT UNIVERSITY

● Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, it is my pleasure today to recognize the 40th anniversary of a fine academic institution, Marymount University. Located in Arlington, VA, it was founded in 1950 by the Religious of the Sacred Heart of Mary as a 2-year liberal arts college for women.

Although the first graduating class had only 9 members, Marymount has grown into a coeducational 4-year university with a student body of nearly 3,000. Academic programs today include both undergraduate and graduate studies in education-human resources, nursing, arts and sciences, and business administration.

This success is due in large part to the 30 years of outstanding leadership of Sister Majella, who is now the longest tenured woman president in the country.

It is indeed an honor to salute Marymount University on this happy occasion. I wish the students, faculty, and administration continued growth and success in this 40th anniversary year as well as in the years to come.●

MIKE KENNEDY, SMALL BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION'S MINNESOTA MEDIA ADVOCATE

● Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I would like to take this opportunity to say a few words about a fine business leader who had devoted many years assisting in the development and growth of small businesses. I am speaking of Mike Kennedy, former business editor, St. Cloud Daily Times.

Mr. Kennedy has just been chosen as the Small Business Administration's Minnesota District Media Advocate of 1990. For many years Mike wrote articles for the St. Cloud Daily Times that served to bring the small business and the consumer together on a common ground. Mike sought to educate the small business owner on current issues and trends and to educate the consumer on the value of small businesses to the community. Both efforts resulted in a heightened overall awareness and appreciation of both groups within the community.

Mr. Kennedy's commitment and contribution to the advancement of small business is being recognized today as he is chosen as the Small Business Administration's Minnesota District Media Advocate of the year 1990. I congratulate him for his efforts and wish him continued success.●

(a) AMOUNT OF PAYMENTS.—(1) Subparagraph (A) of section 3(d)(2) of Public Law 81-874 is amended to read as follows:

"(A)(i) Except as provided in clause (ii), for any fiscal year after September 30, 1988, funds reserved to make payments under subparagraph (B) shall not exceed $25,000,000 from the funds appropriated for such fiscal year.

"(ii) In the event that the payments made under subparagraph (B) in any fiscal year are less than $25,000,000, such remaining funds as do not exceed $25,000,000 shall remain available until expended for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of subparagraph (B). Such remaining funds shall not be considered part of the funds reserved to make payments under subparagraph (B), but shall be expended if funds in excess of $25,000,000 are needed to carry out the provisions of subparagraph (B) in any fiscal year.

"(iii) If for any fiscal year the total amount of payments to be made under subparagraph (B) exceeds $25,000,000 and the funds described in clause (ii) are insufficient to make such payments, then the provisions of clause (i) shall not apply.".

(2) Subparagraph (B) of section 2(b)(2) of Public Law 101-26 is hereby repealed, and Public Law 81-874 shall be applied and administered as if such subparagraph (B) (and the amendment made by such subparagraph) had not been enacted.

(b) ADJUSTMENTS FOR DECREASES IN FEDERAL ACTIVITIES.—Section 3(e) of Public Law 81-874 is amended to read as follows:

"(e)(1) Whenever the Secretary of Education determines that—

"(A) for any fiscal year, the number of children determined with respect to any local educational agency under subsections (a) and (b) is less than 90 percent of the number so determined with respect to such agency during the preceding fiscal year;

"(B) there has been a decrease or cessation of Federal activities within the State in which such agency is located; and

"(C) such decrease or cessation has resulted in a substantial decrease in the number of children determined under subsections (a) and (b) with respect to such agency for such fiscal year;

the amount to which such agency is entitled for such fiscal year and for any of the 3 succeeding fiscal years shall not be less than 90 percent of the payment such agency received under subsections (a) and (b) for the preceding fiscal year.

"(2) There is authorized to be appropriated for each fiscal year such amount as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this section, which remain available until expended.

Each such application shall be submitted in such form, and containing such information, as the Secretary may reasonably require to determine whether such agency is entitled to a payment under any of such sections and the amount of any such payment.

"(2) The Secretary shall establish a deadline for the receipt of applications. For each fiscal year beginning with fiscal year 1991, the Secretary shall accept an approvable application received up to 60 days after the deadline, but shall reduce the payment based on such late application by 10 percent of the amount that would otherwise be paid. The Secretary shall not accept or approve any application submitted more than 60 days after the application deadline.

"(3) Notwithstanding any other provision of law or regulation, a State educational agency that had been accepted as an applicant for funds under section 3 for fiscal years 1985, 1986, 1987 and 1988 shall be permitted to continue as an applicant under the same conditions by which it made application during such fiscal years only if such State educational agency distributes all funds received for the students for which application is being made by such State educational agency to the local educational agencies providing educational services to such students.".

(d) ADJUSTMENTS.—Section 5(c)(2) of Public Law 81-874 is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following new subparagraph:

"(C) was previously part of a school district upon being constituted or reconstituted.

For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of section 3(a), such term includes any agency or school authority that has had an arrangement with a nonadjacent school district for the education of children of persons who reside or work on an installation of the Department of Defense for more than 25 years, but only if the Secretary determines that there is no single school distict adjacent to the school district in which the installation is located that is capable of educating all such children.".

SEC. . STUDENT LITERACY CORPS.

Section 146 of the Higher Education Act of 1956 is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 146. AUTHORIZATON OF APPROPRIATIONS.

"There are authorized to be appropriated to carry out the provisions of this part $10,000,000 for fiscal year 1991.".

SEC. . THE HEAD START ACT AND CHAPTER 1 OF TITLE I OF THE ELEMENTARY AND SECONDARY EDUCATION ACT OF 1965.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Senate finds that—

(1) one in every five children in America, some 12,600,000 youngsters under the age of 18, live in poverty;

(2) the Head Start program and programs under chapter 1 of title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 are proven early education programs that offer the best opportunity to break the cycle of poverty;

(3) since 1980, spending by the Federal Government for education has decreased by 4.7 percent in real terms;

(4) $1 invested in high-quality preschool programs like Head Start and chapter 1 of title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 saves $6 in lowered costs for special education, grade retention, public assistance, and crime;

(5) children who enroll in Head Start are more likely than other poor children to be literate, employed, and enrolled in postsecondary education;

(6) children who enroll in Head Start programs are less likely than other poor children to be high school dropouts, teen parents, dependent on welfare, or arrested for criminal or delinquent activity;

(7) children who enroll in programs under chapter 1 of title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 experience larger increases in standardized achievement scores than comparable students who did not enroll in such programs;

(8) low funding levels for the Head Start Act limit the participation in Head Start programs to less than 20 percent of the eligible population; and

(9) low funding levels for chapter 1 and title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 limit participation in programs assisted under such Act to less than 50 percent of the eligible population.

(b) SENSE OF SENATE.—It is the sense of the Senate that appropriations for the Head Start Act should be increased to fully serve the potential, eligible population under such Act by fiscal year 1994 and that appropriations for chapter 1 of title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 should be increased to the authorization level of such Act by fiscal year 1994.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, one of the provisions of the amendment before us today makes an important technical change to the manner in which the Department of Education is authorized to handle late applications under the Impact Aid Program. Under current law, a district that misses the application deadline loses its eligibility for impact aid funds. This can cause severe hardship for districts with large numbers of federally impacted students. I am told that this year there could be as many as 141 school districts in this predicament, including the Newport School District in my own home State of Rhode Island.

Last year and again with the amendment before us today, we have had to rectify this situation by passing special legislation to extend the application deadline. This should not be necessary. Therefore, in addition to an extension for this year, the amendment before us would establish a permanent system for handling late applications.

After the filing deadline, the Department of Education would notify any district that normally receives an impact aid payment if the district's application had not been received. It is our intent that this be done within 30 days of the deadline. Districts could then submit their applications, but would receive a 10-percent penalty for late filing. Any application received after 60 days of the initial deadline would be considered ineligible for assistance.

Mr. President, I believe we can all agree that this is a very reasonable solution to a very technical problem. I thank my colleagues for their support in rectifying this situation.

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. Mr. President, I am pleased to join a number of my colleagues in cosponsoring this package of technical amendments which make much needed corrections to the Impact Aid Program.

The Impact Aid Program is very important to Kansas. In particular, Fort Leavenworth and Fort Riley are heavily dependent upon the Federal moneys that this program brings to their school districts. Fort Riley, which is located in Junction City Unified School District, has a 70 percent federally connected student population which means that last year, they received close to $4.5 million in Federal impact aid funds.

The other district which I mentioned is the Fort Leavenworth School District in Fort Leavenworth, KS. To my knowledge, there is no other school district in the country quite like Fort Leavenworth. Fort Leavenworth is a coterminous school district with a 100-percent federally connected population—99 percent of which are "A" students. There is a military college for officers located at Fort Leavenworth which offers 1-year military training, so the Fort Leavenworth schools have a 70 percent annual turnover rate in their school population.

Currently, the teacher-student ratio at Fort Leavenworth is 1:17—higher than the majority of Kansas schools. In smaller school districts throughout the State, this ratio dips as low as 1:7. Seven classes at Fort Leavenworth have 27 students each this year, and the first grade classes had 23. The educators at Fort Leavenworth are not extravagant or asking that their students receive an education that is better than the rest of the State. Rather, they are trying to make sure that the students at Fort Leavenworth are treated equally.

The figures above highlight the need that exists for impact aid funds at Fort Leavenworth, in particular, the necessity for 3(d)(2)(B) payments. Section 3(d)(2)(B) is the only section in the impact aid law that is based on need. These funds are awarded to districts which are severely impacted by Federal activities—over 50 percent of their student population are federally connected children. Section 3(d)(2)(B) payments are the first payments made under section 3 of the Impact Aid Program because these districts are considered the most needy.

Last year, officials at the Department of Education withheld $50 million from section 3 for section 3(d)(2)(B) payments. Although they expected payments to be around $10 million or $12 million, they wanted to withhold $50 million in case other districts became eligible for 3(d)(2)(B) payments. This added withholding of funds created a burden on "b" payments by reducing their pool of money by $36 to $40 million—the amount of money being overwithheld by the Department of Education. Officials at the Department of Education would not free up the $36 million without some type of legislation. To help solve this dilemma, staff at the Department of Education Impact Aid Office suggested limiting or capping the amount of money withheld for section 3(d)(2)(B) payments to $14 million. This number, $14 million, was the largest sum of final payments the Department had made for section 3(d)(2)(B) to date. At that point, Department officials indicated that future payments for section 3(d)(2)(B) would not likely exceed $14 million and were confident that a $20 million cap would never be reached.

I had serious reservations about placing a limit on the 3(d)(2)(B) section since Fort Leavenworth often qualifies for these payments, and because Fort Leavenworth is so dependent upon Federal impact aid funds for survival. A compromise was reached which raised the tax effort provision from 80 to 95 percent—preventing a large influx of new districts qualifying for section 3(d)(2)(B) payments—and added a $20 million cap on the 3(d)(2)(B) section. The $20 million figure was a $6 million cushion over the Department's $14 million estimate. Negotiators of this compromise also agreed to revisit this issue if a problem occurred where payments were projected to exceed the $20 million cap.

Unfortunately, these estimates have already proven to be inaccurate. The final cost for section 3(d)(2)(B) was recently computed for 1988 and was $20.2 million—already over the $20 million cap. The estimate for 1989 is projected to be $13.5 million. The estimate for 1990 is $19.7 million which does not include a number of districts expected to qualify for these payments. When these districts are included, the cost of 3(d)(2)(B) goes as high as $27.8 million.

I appreciate the help of Senator PELL and his staff in finding a solution to this problem which is so very important to 3(d)(2)(B) districts. I am particularly happy that the commitment made by negotiators 1 year ago to revisit this issue if a problem arose was honored.

The language included today in H.R. 3910 raises the 3(d)(2)(B) cap to $25 million and creates a reserve pool of funds to help with potential shortfalls in the 3(d)(2)(B) section. This means that when payments for section 3(d)(2)(B) are less than $25 million for a given year, the money is set aside in an emergency fund for when payments for another year exceed the $25 million cap. I have been told that this combination of funding mechanisms should provide full funding for all eligible 3(d)(2)(B) districts until the 1992 reauthorization. Due to the highly variable nature of these figures, it is difficult to be absolutely positive that the funding mechanism I have described above will guarantee full payments to all eligible 3(d)(2)(B) districts. Because of this factor, the amendment includes language which removes the $25 million cap if payments for section 3(d)(2)(B) go over the $25 million reserve figure and the reserve pool does not have enough money to meet the payment obligations of section 3(d)(2)(B).

In the 1984 reauthorization of the Impact Aid Program (Public Law 98-511), language was included which prevented the Secretary from prorating payments made to local education agencies [LEA's] under section 3(d)(2)(B). Last year when the $20 million cap was placed into law, it was not intended that these payments would ever be prorated and that the language would in any way confuse or contradict the 1984 language. The language included in H.R. 3910 today insures that the language and intent of the 1984 legislation as well as the basic intent of the original legislation, Public Law 81-874, is carried out.

Mr. RUDMAN. Mr. President, I am pleased to join the distinguished chairman and ranking Republican member of the Education Subcommittee in cosponsoring an amendment to correct a problem which has arisen with impact aid payments to school districts affected by the Base Closure and Realignment Act (Public Law 100-526).

In 1974, Congress recognized that the failure to provide a gradual reduction in impact aid payments to school districts experiencing a sudden decrease in the enrollment of Federal students resulting from the closure of military bases would create havoc with the budgets of those school districts. As a result, the Education Amendments of 1974 included language to provide phase-down assistance over a period of 4 years to such school districts. This language entitled local education agencies meeting certain criteria to receive phase-down assistance equal to 90 percent of the agency's previous year's entitlement, thereby providing a gradual reduction in their impact aid assistance payments.

Mr. President, these hold harmless provisions have not been used since the last round of base closures during the mid to late 1970's. In preparing for the new round of base closures under the Base Closure and Realignment Act, I have discovered that a recent interpretation of the 1974 statute by general counsel at the Department of Education will result in a precipitous loss of payments to school districts attempting to cope with base closures.

Portsmouth, NH, will be the first community in the country to cope with the closure of a military base. According to information provided by the Department of Education and based upon this new general counsel interpretation of the statute, impact aid payments to Portsmouth would decrease from $2,361,500 in the 1989-90 school year to $318,800 in the 1990-91 school year, the first school year following the closure of Pease Air Force Base. In other words, this general counsel interpretation undermines the intent of the statute's phase-down provision.

Mr President, I have used Portsmouth as an example because it is the one school district for which there is reasonably accurate data on the number of affected students. However, while Portsmouth will be the first community in the Nation to cope with the closure of a military base, it certainly will not be the last. I believe it is critical that we do not abandon these districts who have been educating our military children for many years on the basis of what I believe to be an erroneous general counsel determination. Congress clearly intended to provide a gradual and orderly phase down of Federal assistance when it adopted this hold harmless provision in 1974 and I believe that it is critical that we maintain the commitment made at that time.

I have carefully reviewed the legislative history surrounding the enactment of the 1974 statute, and as I indicated, I do not believe that the Department of Education is correct in its interpretation. However, the willingness of my distinguished colleagues to work with me to uphold the original intent of the statute, makes the approach taken by this amendment preferable to a contentious and drawn out debate with the Department over the need to protect these affected districts. This amendment makes minor changes in section 3(e) of Public Law 81-874 to clarify that school districts coping with base closures are in fact entitled to gradual phase-down assistance over a period of 4 years.

Mr. President, the amendment authorizes appropriations necessary to carry out the phase-down provision to ensure that payments to school districts affected by base closings will not adversely affect other impacted school districts, which have not incurred a loss of students. The amendment also directs the Secretary of Education to make available to the Congress, in annual budget submissions, the amount of funds necessary to defray the costs associated with the phase-down provision. If Congress is to adequately address the needs of the affected school districts, it must have information concerning the number of affected districts and students and associated costs.

Finally, I would like to thank Senators PELL and KASSEBAUM and their staffs for their assistance and willingness to resolve this problem in an expeditious fashion.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I would like to voice my strong support for the pending amendment to section 3(e) of the impact aid statute.

We are all familiar with section 3 of Public Law 81-874, which provides financial assistance for local education agencies in areas where Federal activities increase the number of children a district must educate. Section 3 payments are allocated based on enrollment of two types of students: students whose parents live and work on Federal property (category A), and students whose parents live or work on Federal property (category B).

However, section 3(e), which authorizes phase-out entitlements to school districts losing a substantial number of Federally connected children due to a reduced Federal presence, is often overlooked. Specifically, section 3(e) provides eligible school districts with a 3-year phase-down of hold harmless payments to minimize the trauma of large scale Federal reductions. These payments are calculated at 90 percent of the prior year's category 3(A) and 3(B) entitlement.

The fact that section 3(e) is often overlooked is somewhat understandable considering that more than a decade has elapsed since it was last applied. However, the imminent closure of several military bases, as mandated by the Base Closure and Realignment Act, has renewed public interest and attention toward the Impact Aid Program. This scrutinty has identified a significant inequity within section 3(e) which, if uncorrected, will wreak economic havoc on many of our Nation's communities.

The Department of Education interprets section 3(e) to direct that hold harmless payments be calculated at 90 percent of a district's prior year payment, based on a category B student classification. Since the Department has prioritized impact aid funds to primarily benefit category A group schools, category B payments are calculated at a substantially reduced percentage of entitlement. As a result, certain districts affected by a base closure, who are eligible for section 3(e) funding, will suffer a dramatic and substantial decrease in impact aid funding. This is clearly at odds with the gradual phase-down intended by the authors of the impact aid statute.

Mr. President, Pease Air Force Base, NH, is the first installation to close under the Base Closure and Realignment Act. The Federally-connected children from Pease attend Portsmouth District Schools. According to the Air Force, the vast majority of these schoolchildren will depart prior to the September 1990 census. Although Portsmouth is eligible for hold harmless payments under section 3(e), the projected payments will defray only a fraction of the educational costs associated with the base closure. In fact, the Department of Education has estimated that, under the current system, Portsmouth's impact aid allocation will fall from $2.2 million in fiscal year 1990, to approximately $300,000 in fiscal year 1991. This hardly represents a gradual phase-down.

Mr. President, the pending legislation simply amends section 3(e) of Public Law 81-874 to clarify what was obviously the intent of the original statute's authors: to ensure economic and educational stability in the wake of Federal reductions. Specifically, the amendment provides that hold harmless payments under section 3(e) shall not be less than 90 percent of the school district's prior year impact aid payments. Thus, Portsmouth, NH, and other districts affected by base closures are assured of appropriate funding during these difficult transitions.

I commend the chairman and ranking member of the Education Subcommittee for their prompt action, and I urge my colleagues to adopt this important amendment.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

CONGRESSMAN IKE SKELTON'S ADDRESS TO WORLD CHURCH CONFERENCE

HON. IKE SKELTON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 7, 1990

Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, on April 1, I addressed the World Church Conference at the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints in Independence, MO, regarding the inspirational role of religion during this time of political reform in Eastern and Central Europe. I am submitting this address for inclusion in today's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

CONGRESSMAN IKE SKELTON'S ADDRESS TO WORLD CHURCH CONFERENCE

In April of 1968, I recall Senator Stuart Symington, Missouri's senior Senator, spoke at this distinguished gathering. At that time, I thought that Senator Symington had received one of the highest honors of his career. Today, I have that same privilege of addressing this prestigious body, and I treasure this honor as a highlight of my public service career.

A number of years ago in my church in Lexington, MO, our young minister approached the pulpit at the point in the service designated sermon. He paused for a moment and said, "God has not spoken to me this week, thus, I have nothing to say," and sat down.

Today, I know that most of you realize that today is April 1st—April Fools' Day—and that you have a politician scheduled to address you. I assure you that I do have a message and that I will not say "April Fools" and sit down.

There's the old hymn, one of my mother's favorites, that has the refrain, "Count your many blessings, count them one by one." Were we to follow this advice, undoubtedly the top of the list would be the blessing of living in our country and being an American. God has truly smiled on our Nation, a country that enjoys certain constitutional guarantees. The first amendment to the Constitution provides freedom of religion, freedom of speech, freedom of press, the right of assembly, and the right to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. As a result, we are the bastion of freedom on this globe. And all too often we take these freedoms and liberties for granted. Would it be that these rights be granted to every living human being on this globe. But that is not the case.

There is the ancient Chinese curse, "May you live in interesting times." Well, whether it be a curse or not, we do live in interesting times. Rather, as I prefer, times of challenges and opportunities.

During my lifetime the world has witnessed war, destruction, and oppression, much of which is too horrible to describe. But the world is changing—at least parts of it.

On November 11, 1989, the 71st anniversary for the ending of the First World War, a portion of the Berlin Wall dividing East and West Germany was torn down by Germans on each side of the wall. Since then, the Communist governments of each of the Eastern European states have been toppled. East Germany, Hungary, Poland, Romania, Czechoslovakia, and Bulgaria are now led by transitional and newly elected noncommunist governments. Even within the Soviet Union, there are massive movements to social and economic reform underway. One of the Soviet States, Lithuania, has just declared its independence.

Thus, we can agree that we do live in interesting times—times of rapid change—times of reform—and times of uncertainty. Alexis de Tocqueville said, "The most dangerous time in history is when a government is trying to reform itself." De Tocqueville's warning is applicable to these present days because the people in these countries who are breaking off their shackles of the past will have high expectations—expectations for freedom—and expectations for economic opportunity. Most of these countries do not understand the concept of freedom. For instance, in Bulgaria, freedom means to most ethnic Bulgarians that they have the right to throw out the Bulgarians of Turkish descent. Concerning economics, there is little understanding of entrepreneurship and the work ethic has been suppressed by a generation of repression.

In a word, we have won the cold war. The containment of communism doctrine, orginally established by Independence's own President Harry Truman, has succeeded. The walls of tyranny are crumbling. But unfulfilled high expectations hang like the sword of Damocles over the heads of Europe and the free world.

A few weeks ago, I heard someone say in a sermon, "It is not the love of power, it is the power of love" that gives men and women the motivation to aspire and to build a better world, closer to the ideals of the Kingdom of God, a world from which fear, oppression, and cruelty will be banished.

History repeats this message in various forms over and over again. On a plaque on the stairwell of the pedestal of the Statute of Liberty, the timeless words of Abraham Lincoln are penned,

"Our reliance is in the love of liberty which God has planted in our bosoms. Our Defense is in the preservation of the spirit which prizes liberty as the heritage of all men, in all lands, every where. Destroy this spirit, and you have planted the seeds of despotism around your own doors."

If the newly emerging democracies are to succeed—to realize their expectations, they must find this power of love and this spirit of liberty. If they are to do so, they must first achieve true religious freedom.

In the U.S., religious freedom is guaranteed by law to all. We have the right to teach religion to adults and children; to publish religious materials; charity work is encouraged; and we do not have so-called "recognized" or "unrecognized" religions. Religious faith surrounds us. It expresses our values. Our children are raised with it. Religion is a part of everyday life.

Let's glance quickly at the situation in the countries of Eastern Europe as they move toward religious freedom.

The role of religion in Eastern Europe is in a State of flux, marked by unprecedented concessions on the part of the State, what many regard as an irreversible movement toward religious freedom. At the heart of the religious movement, much work is being done on legislation that limits or denies the rights of religious organizations and of believers.

In Hungary, religious affairs have been strictly regulated by the Hungarian Communist Party since the late 1940s. Until recently, some Hungarians have been confined as "prisoners of conscience." Now this is ending. New legislation is being framed which would give religious bodies legal status, establish the right to pubish journals and periodicals, provide equal taxation for all citizens, and guarantee the right to teach religion.

In Poland, the Roman Catholic Church, representing 95 percent of the Polish population, has been the front-line force in the changes that have taken place in Poland for the past ten years. The Communist government has never been able to harness the Catholic Church but this past spring, the government recognized the Roman Catholic Church, reinstating rights lost by the church after the Communist takeover. Now, as the mediator between the people and government authorities, the church may publish newspapers, it may operate schools, hospitals, and communications networks—all without interference from the state. Laws assuring freedom of worship have been formed.

For almost half a century, evangelical charity, and missionary work has been prohibited in Czechoslovakia. Now, these religious rights are permissible, and restrictions on literature are slowly loosening.

In Romania, largely Romanian Orthodox with a growing congregation of Baptists and Pentecostals, Lutheran Minister Lazslo Tokes was a key leader in the overthrow of the brutal Communist leader Nicole Ceausescu in December.

A couple of months ago, a colleague of mine, Chet Atkins, was in Romania travelling with a delegation from the Unitarian Church to visit church leaders and leaders of the new government. Only three weeks before his visit, the people had been forbidden to speak with a foreigner or discuss the government in church. Congressman Atkins preached in reformed and unitarian parishes that were overflowing with hundreds of people. He said the experience was highly emotional and moving. He saw memorials in the streets, wreaths, candles, flowers * * * all testimony of the presence of religion and the power of God. And in the faces of the people, he saw something more than the absence of oppression, he saw an entirely new spirit of religion developing, a spiritual awakening in the springtime of religious liberties.

And in East Germany, this past Christmas was the first time since the Communist takeover that Christmas bells are sounded in Berlin. The people of Berlin attended joint services for the first time since the Wall went up in 1961. Like the bells of liberty we hear every day and the bells of church services which ring across our Nation each Sunday, the sound of church bells ringing through East Germany ushered in hope—and freedom.

In the Soviet Union, for the first time in 70 years, Bibles are being imported. And where the word of God is freely read and listened to, freedom cannot be extinguished.

Let me mention two thoughts that come to mind when I consider the momentous changes that are going on in our world.

During these last few months, we have had three powerful leaders come to the Congress and speak. These three men came representing the emerging freedoms about which I have already spoken.

Lech Walesa came to the Capitol of the United States in November and addressed a joint session of the Congress. As he entered the Chamber of the House of Representatives, there was applause, applause like I have not heard since I came to Congress. The people in the balconies stood and clapped their hands in joyful approval—Members of the House and Senate, Republicans and Democrats, liberals and conservatives, men and women from every one of the fifty States, the President of the United States and members of the President's Cabinet, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the Diplomatic Corps—everyone standing and cheering, resounding applause, for this humble electrician from Gdansk as he stood ready to give his speech.

Lech Walesa had said before his speech that he was not a professional politician—that he was just an electrician, and if the lights were to go off in the building, he could fix them! And then he proceeded to give words of achievement and hope.

In February, the President of Czechoslovakia, Vaclav Havel, came to address another joint meeting. Again, the thunderous applause, the shouts of approval. He said in his speech that he had not gone to school for Presidents—he had been to prison, under arrest, and now he spoke before the Nation with the oldest Constitution, and he spoke of freedom and of hope.

And just recently, on the 15th of March, the Reverend Lazslo Tokes, gave the opening prayer at the session of the House of Representatives. This humble minister, only 37 years old, prayed * * * "We long after love and peace—please change our minds and feelings, make us capable to 'not love in word or speech, but in deed and in truth.'"

All these new leaders—one an electrician, another a playwright, and another a minister—are now called by free people to lead them into the world of hope.

The first point I would make is that each of these men came from the ranks of the people. They represented change from the people up to the Government. They are the symbols of the desires of the people to reclaim what God had originally given to them, the right to believe and practice their faith, to worship their God as they choose. The people called out, they stood with their bodies on the line, they had sacrificed and were ready to stand up to the dictators, now they were free.

Three seemingly ordinary men armed only with the tools of their trades—one an electrician who was trained to weld steel together, one a playwright armed with only his pen, and the third a minister, armed with his faith.

But they had dedicated their lives to something greater than their trades or their professions—they were dedicated to being the people that God would have them be. And God blessed them as they guided the people out of darkness into light.

My second point is simple. How is it that these brave men and their people are bound together one with another, and how are we in solidarity with them?

It is through prayer. We may support them in other ways, but it is through prayer we become one people under God. Prayer is the only instrument that crosses all boundaries without limitation or restraint, without language or tradition, without common cultures or experiences. Prayer unites, prayer sustains, prayer makes us one people, prayer gives hope, prayer brings us into a power much greater than ourselves. Prayer transcends all our personal limitations, forgives our shortcomings, encourages us to be as God would have us be.

There will be initiatives coming from the Congress as to ways we can better help these people, but I would share with you today something of power that each one of you already knows—the power and reality of prayer.

As I stand here in front of this assembly of people of prayer, I ask you to join with me in remembering these leaders and their nations with fervent hope that God will continue to bless them in the days ahead. Reverend Lazslo Tokes used in his prayer before the House of Representatives—"Bless our lives. Bless our faith and deeds. Bless our countries and people. Give us freedom and Peace."

Alfred Lord Tennyson wrote this great truth: "More things are wrought by prayer than this world dreams of."

God bless you.

REFORMING THE EXPORT ADMINISTRATION ACT

HON. DOUG BEREUTER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 7, 1990

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Speaker, last week the Foreign Affairs Committee completed consideration of H.R. 4653, to reauthorize the Export Administration Act of 1979.

The international marketplace has become very competitive, and the survival of many U.S. firms is dependent on their ability to compete in global markets. International competition is daunting and the deficit in our balance of trade continues to be a major concern.

In spite of these important challenges and difficulties, inappropriate elements and procedures related to our own export controls continue to give our competitors additional advantages and inhibit the ability of our own firms to export. These problems with the implementation of our controls also impair the ability of U.S. companies to gain economies of scale necessary for them to survive in a competitive international marketplace. This unfortunate scenario not only reduces employment opportunities in the short run, but has also contributed to our declining preeminence in many high technology industries.

We must streamline this process and remove the barriers which place our critical export industries in a disadvantageous position relative to our international competitors. Petty bureaucratic infighting and blatant disregard of congressional directives by various parts of the executive branch charged with managing our export controls have in the past done incredible damage to high technology and defense industries of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, the following article appeared in the April 20, 1990, Journal of Commerce. It was written by Carole Grundberg, a highly capable and respected former staff director of the International Economic Policy and Trade Subcommittee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee. In this editorial, Ms. Grundberg explains well some of the problems faced by our exporters as a result of an export licensing system. This Member asks the executive branch to recognize these and other current difficulties, and work with the members of the House Foreign Affairs Committee and the Congress to fix the system. While we must limit the flow of critical technologies to potential adversaries, we cannot continue to destroy our high technology and defense industries by pointlessly frustrating the efforts of exporters and thereby assisting their competitors.

MAKE COCOM FACE THE FUTURE

(By Carole A. Grunberg)

American high-tech exporters are about to take on anti-Soviet hard-liners once again in the struggle over the future of export controls.

The battlefield is Capitol Hill, where Congress is considering the renewal of the Export Administration Act, which expires in September. This law is the president's primary authority to regulate exports to protect national security, foreign policy and other interests.

High-tech companies and their congressional advocates already have fired opening salvos in a series of bills that would radically restructure U.S. and multilateral export control regimes. Paralyzed by differences among various agencies, the Bush administration has responded by proposing a simple one-year extension of current law.

Export controls affect at least half of the more than $365 billion annual sales by U.S. aerospace, business equipment, computer, machine tool and telecommunications companies.

The National Academy of Sciences conservatively estimated in 1987 that the annual direct cost of export controls to American businesses ran upwards of $9 billion. Indirect costs in terms of lost opportunities range far higher, and are in part responsible for the 30% decline in the U.S. share of the world electronics market since 1985.

Simply put, there are too many older products on the control list, and the United States unilaterally restricts exports of thousands of goods that are in wide circulation throughout the world.

Although product life cycles in high-tech industries typically average 24 months, thousands of items first produced in the 1970s remain subject to controls. The control list, which contains the items whose export is regulated by the 17-nation Coordinating Committee on Multilateral Export Controls, or Cocom, incudes many technological dinosaurs. For example:

In March, the administration proudly announced that it was proposing to lift controls on certain machine tools only to discover that U.S. companies no longer manufacture those older models.

The administration retained controls for years on low-level digital Microvax II computers destined for Eastern Europe despite the fact that Hungary, East Germany and Czechoslovakia all had counterfeit models.

Since the development of the first Winchester disk drive in the 1970s, the storage capacity has jumped from 6 megabytes to 1 gigabyte. Millions of drives are produced around the world every year, yet Cocom still controls the older generation 45 megabyte Winchester.

Every Cocom country uses the Cocom list to regulate exports to Eastern Europe, the Soviet Union and China. However, the United States is alone in extending the list to cover exports to non-communist nations. According to the Commerce Department, 35% of U.S. export license applications are for shipments to our Cocom partners that include Japan, Australia and most West European nations. Less than 15% are for shipments to China, Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union.

Moreover, the U.S. licensing process is notoriously slow compared to those of our competitors. U.S. manufacturers typically must wait 120 days for a license that would be approved in four days in Japan and in two weeks in Europe. An Oregon-based high-tech company recently testified that it spent 18 months designing and developing its product, but needed 19 months to obtain an export license!

Changes in the global strategic and economic balance make bold reforms not only desirable but imperative. The cold warriors who persist in defending a system that has changed little since its birth in 1949 are out of touch with reality.

More Americans now perceive Soviet military prowess as a lesser threat than Japan's economic might. Democracy is replacing communism as the political currency of Eastern Europe. As East and West Germany move to reunite, export controls have been abandoned on goods flowing cross Berlin's former checkpoints, and Bonn has informed its allies that Cocom export restrictions will not apply once Germany is reunited.

For starters, Congress should immediately codify a license-free zone for shipments to Cocom member nations, and then move to lift restrictions on all shipments that are not Cocom-controlled to Free World destinations. This would eliminate approximately 85% of the licensing burden on U.S. exporters.

Consistent with the relatively short product life of state-of-the-art technology, the United States should propose dropping from the Cocom list all items that have been on it for more than three years unless all members agree to keep controls in place. For the items then remaining on the list, exports to Eastern Europe and to non-military end users in the Soviet Union should be approved routinely.

Cocom's decisions affect the plans of thousands of companies and the livelihoods of their employees, but the executive branch keeps a shroud of secrecy around the group. Like the Great Oz, Cocom hides behind a curtain, dictating rules and intimidating exporters. It is time to pull back the curtain. The United States should take the initiative to publish the Cocom list and all Cocom decisions.

A tall order? Hardly. The House of Representatives approved some of these proposals in previous years, and all are under serious consideration in the respective congressional committees. The rising tide of reform in Eastern Europe will carry the fortunes of America's exporters only so far. It is incumbent upon Congress to bring the export control regime into the 21st century.

CONGRATULATIONS TO NEW JERSEY WAVE SWIM TEAM

HON. ROBERT G. TORRICELLI

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 7, 1990

Mr. TORRICELLI. Mr. Speaker, it is with great respect and admiration that I address my colleagues in the House today, for I rise to extend my heartiest congratulations and warmest best wishes to the members of the New Jersey Wave Swim Team.

The New Jersey Wave Swim Team was established in 1974 and is a club consisting of young men and women between the ages of 10 and under through high school. It is a comprehensive program dedicated to excellence not only in swimming, but also in discipline, good health, and dedication to the ideals of the American way of life. The team is broken down into instructional novice, advanced novice, age group, junior group, senior silver, senior prep, senior gold, and the national team.

During the 1989-90 season, the New Jersey Wave Swim Club was ranked seventh in the Nation. They won the New Jersey State Junior Olympics and numerous other State and National meets. The team was first in the national regional meet, the Northern New Jersey Invitational, the Trenton Holiday Classic, and the Connecticut/American AA Swim Meet.

Mr. Speaker I am proud to join in paying tribute to this exceptional group and extend my best wishes to them.

TRIBUTE TO EVELYN SCHENGRUND

HON. WILLIAM LEHMAN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 7, 1990

Mr. LEHMAN of Florida. Mr. Speaker, North Dade County, home of the 17th Congressional District, is fortunate to have one of the most informed and active citizenries in the country. Among the very best is a woman who combines the qualities of boundless hard work and noble idealism—my good friend, Evelyn Schengrund.

Especially in Northeast Dade, Evelyn has long been a determined force for the good of the community. A woman of quiet dignity and infectious enthusiasm, she is a strong believer in and practitioner of the politics of inclusion. Evelyn works hard to get as many people as possible involved in the governmental process. A firm believer that policy improves with greater citizen participation, Evelyn sets high standards for herself and never shirks doing whatever is necessary to make our democratic government function as well as possible.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to share with my colleagues an article on Evelyn Schengrund that appeared in the Spring edition of Aventura magazine:

EVELYN SCHENGRUND

(By Carol Romano)

"My job is not to be popular, my job is to get things done for the party." But Democratic Party Executive Committeewoman Evelyn Schengrund has ample proof that within Democratic circles she could win a popularity contest hands down.

A tiny woman whose smartly tailored shoulders bear the responsibility for getting folks fired up enough to get out and vote in 5 districts, Schengrund's appearance belies her strength. Beyond that soft-spoken lady facade resides a fiercely loyal, determined and politically savvy woman who brings years of business acumen and the passion of a concerned—yes, she allows the use of the "L" word—liberal, to the service of Dade's Democratic machine.

Schengrund's political life began in earnest when she retired from her third career. A retail business had led her into real estate ventures which, in turn propelled her into the role of developer. Retiring in 1976 from her position as president of Princeton Colonial Park in Princeton, New Jersey, she decided to move closer to her sister and begin a new life in Dade County. Dade County has never been the same!

"My Jewish immigrant parents imbued me from early childhood with a love for America that remains with me today. A respect for business success was a part of their ethic as well as an understanding of the power of politics. The political arena is, in my opinion, where America is at its best." Contending that political activism is the key to a strong, healthy democracy, Schengrund has little patience with apathy. "One must defend oneself against any denigration of enthusiasm" she insists. "I won't allow apathy to exist around me. I infect with my enthusiasm and that's how I get people involved in all sorts of movements."

Sometimes the causes for which she fights are minor ones, a conveniently placed bus stop or postal box, the cleanup and beautification of an abandoned lot near the entrance to her condominium, but just as often her issues are vital ones. Schengrund co-chaired a coalition sponsoring corporate child care centers in the workplace and lobbied strongly on the pro-choice question. She organized Seniors For Choice in the Aventura community. Without exposing these more fragile activists to the rigors of long, hot hours on the streets of the Capitol, Schengrund's flair for statement gave them a chance to publicly state their views in a packed meeting held in the auditorium of their high-rise. The turnout, a mini rally with hundreds of senior men and women, received broad media coverage.

"Organization is my forte," she says. "I feel that this community has great representation—all Democratic of course," (a touchingly girlish giggle accompanies that remark) "and I want to keep it that way. People want to keep Aventura the gem that it is. They are proud to be part of the growth here and they know that good political connections are of great value. As their political activist I am always available to the people of this community. They can come to me with any problem."

Indeed, interest in politics and government is high here. There is an outstanding turnout for elections, as high as 70% in general elections; impressive numbers which far exceed the national average. That doesn't mean that party workers like Schengrund rest on their statistics. "I wake up and start my day by reading the paper from cover to cover. By 9 a.m. I'm on the phone, arranging, programming, scheduling meetings between candidates and constituents, fulfilling my duties as committeewoman. Every day I lunch with constituents to keep in touch with their concerns. I'm a widow, I'm free and I'm used to doing things my way. That's how my life revolves now and I wouldn't have it otherwise."

1990 is shaping up as an exciting time for Schengrund. Catastrophic health care, the fight to lower insurance rates, continuing the struggle for quality child care, all are on her agenda; but most important of all is to play her part in seating a Democrat in the Governor's mansion.

TRIBUTE TO BONNER UPSHAW

HON. DAVID E. BONIOR

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 7, 1990

Mr. BONIOR. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to an outstanding individual, Mr. Bonner Upshaw. Mr. Upshaw is being honored by the Bonner Upshaw Testimonial Committee for his hard work as a Mount Clemens police officer.

Mr. Upshaw was born in Mount Clemens, MI, where he attended public schools until he graduated from Mount Clemens High School in 1951. After a year at the University of Michigan, Bonner enlisted into the U.S. Navy in 1952. Beginning in 1958, after serving 4 years in the U.S. Navy, Bonner played semiprofessional football with the South Macomb Arrows for 3 years. In 1960, Bonner became the first African-American police officer in the history of Mount Clemens.

Mr. Upshaw served on the police force for 25 years, during which he was a detective for 9 years. He retired in 1985, after a distinguished career in law enforcement.

Mr. Upshaw opened doors for others to follow. It is my privilege to honor such a leader in our community. I wish Mr. Upshaw the best. He will long be remembered as a true friend to the city of Mount Clemens.

ATLANTA FAA ARTCC FACILITY RECOGNIZED

HON. NEWT GINGRICH

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 7, 1990

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, the Sixth District of Georgia is proud to be the home of the Atlanta air route traffic control center [ARTCC] located in Hampton. This year we are particularly honored because the Federal Aviation Administration [FAA] has recently chosen the airways facilities sector at the Atlanta ARTCC for its 1989 Airway Facilities Sector of the Year award.

An ARTCC is a center which controls all air traffic beyond 50 miles of an airport. A sector is that department within an air traffic control center responsible for maintaining the computerized radar and communication equipment used for air traffic control. The prestigious designation of 1989 ARTCC Sector of the Year comes from the FAA as a result of Hampton's successful competition with America's other 20 regional ARTCC's.

Every year the FAA reviews nomination packages submitted by participating ARTCC's. After screening the applications, the ARTCC's are rated by a scoring process. The score sheet takes into consideration three areas. "General Programs," such as cost efficient measures taken and emergency conditions dealt with or avoided, count 13 percent toward the overall score. "Human resource management programs," including personnel development practices and opportunities for personnel to express their ideas, opinions, and concerns about the work environment and sector operations, count 37 percent. And, the most heavily weighted, "facility performance," a quantitative measure of how often and how long the computerized radar at an airways facility is down—out of operation—counts 50 percent toward the overall score.

When the results were in, the sector maintenance employees at the Atlanta air route traffic control center were ranked first in the Nation because of their outstanding performance during 1989. I am sure I speak for all sixth district residents when I offer my congratulations and praise to Mr. Gene Nobles, sector manager of the Atlanta ARTCC, and the entire team of sector maintenance employees at the Atlanta ARTCC for their commitment to excellence.

In a very real way, these professionals hold the flying public's safety in their hands. They keep our air traffic computers up and running, and the Atlanta sector ARTCC employees are rated top in the nation for doing so. That is something Georgia can be very proud of. The reward for the Hampton team, however, is not only this official recognition by the FAA, but also the thanks of countless air passengers who have traveled safely due to the outstanding sector service provided in Hampton, GA.

I urge my colleagues to join me and my constituents in commending the sector maintenance employees at the Atlanta air traffic control center for the fine work they are doing. On June 26, 1990, there will be a ceremony in Hampton for the sector team. At that time representatives from the FAA will present a plaque in honor of the group's achievement. But our thanks and congratulations go out today, to every one of the sector employees at Hampton for a job well done and a job done well every day.

TWENTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF VOCA

HON. DOUG BEREUTER

OF NEBRASKA

Monday, May 7, 1990

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Speaker, today, this Member would like to congratulate Volunteers in Overseas Cooperative Assistance, known as VOCA, for 20 years of service to farmers and cooperatives around the world. Almost 200 volunteers will be gathering in Washington from all over the country this week to celebrate and share their experience as volunteers in helping others help themselves.

VOCA sends experienced senior cooperative executives and agricultural experts overseas to provide short-term technical assistance to cooperatives, private sector agricultural enterprises and government agencies in developing countries.

Since its founding in 1970, VOCA has completed more than 800 projects in some 87 developing nations, and has passed on appropriate U.S. technology and American technical know-how to tens of thousands of farmers and cooperators. Working side-by-side with their local counterparts, VOCA volunteers help improve crop production, processing, storage, marketing, agribusiness development as well as strengthen cooperative operations and management.

All of VOCA's work is done at the request of the organizations in developing countries which insures that the projects are needed and demonstrates a willingness to implement the recommendations.

For VOCA volunteers, often a husband and wife team, their out-of-pocket, air fare and housing expenses are covered; the local organization provides in-country administrative support. This makes VOCA one of the most cost-effective technical assistance organizations of our U.S. foreign assistance program.

Under the SEED legislation, VOCA is implementing a Farmer-to-Farmer Program in Poland which is revitalizing farmer cooperatives and developing private agribusiness. Two teams of U.S. volunteers have already provided critical advice on the management and business operations as Polish farmers reclaim their former state-controlled cooperatives. More than 100 U.S. farmers and agriculturalists will be providing hands-on expertise as the Polish economy shifts to a free market economy.

Of particular satisfaction to this Member is the role of VOCA in addressing international food and hunger needs through implementing the Farmer-to-Farmer Program which I authored in the 1985 farm bill. VOCA provides a valuable people-to-people link in finding practical solutions to world hunger. Because of this outstanding work, President Bush awarded VOCA a Presidential End Hunger Award in 1989.

As we consider the 1990 farm bill, I hope my colleagues will join with me in reauthorizing the Farmer-to-Farmer Program for another 5 years.

Finally, let me say to those VOCA personnel and supporters assembled in Washington that those of us in Congress who know of your great work appreciate what you have done to make the world a better place. We congratulate you. To VOCA and its small staff, I personally wish you well as you begin another decade of excellent service to mankind. You are truly carrying our best commodity to those abroad: American generosity, personal commitment, technical know-how, and a can-do spirit.

COMDR. RUSSELL HARRIS' ADDRESS TO THE MISSOURI STATE SENATE

HON. IKE SKELTON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 7, 1990

Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, recently the Captain of the submarine U.S.S. Jefferson City, Comdr. Russell Harris, visited Missouri's capital city. While there, he addressed the Missouri State Senate and the Missouri House of Representatives. Senator James Mathewson, president pro tem of the Senate, was kind enough to invite me to introduce Commander Harris to the body in which I formerly served. Commander Harris' address to the Missouri State Senate is set forth herein:

Senator Mathewson, members of the Missouri State Senate, ladies and gentlemen: Thank you for the invitation to speak this morning to discuss the birth of the submarine Jefferson City. As I talk about the submarine Jefferson City and her people, be tolerant when I speak of my ship and my crew. I have spent my adult life pursuing submarine command. Consequently, you will find no one more proud or more possessive of Jefferson City and her people than I.

The crew of Jefferson City will ultimately consist of 13 officers and 120 enlisted men.

Approximately half of them are currently abroad. The remainder will report aboard during the course of the next 10 months as we prepare to make our first venture to sea.

Those currently aboard consist primarily of nuclear propulsion plant operators. They will operate propulsion plant systems throughout an arduous and demanding period of testing, aligning, and proofing.

I wish you could meet these men. You will not find a more dedicated, hard working bunch anywhere. They range in age from 20 to 47. The average age is 27 and they come from 24 different states including 4 from the State of Missouri.

The sacrifices they and their families have made and will make have no equivalence outside the nuclear submarine navy. They are true heroes of the cold war and keepers of the peace.

I am sure if you knew them as I do you would be as proud of them as I am. They will do justice to the ship which bears the heritage of hard working, honest folks such as those of her namesake city and state.

Jefferson City will be:

362 feet long;

33 feet in diameter;

And displace 6,000 tons.

She will travel at speeds in excess of 20 knots and dive to depths greater than 400 feet.

She will be equipped with the latest in submarine weaponry, including:

Advanced combat control and acoustic systems;

Heavyweight torpedoes;

Harpoon antiship missiles; and

Tomahawk cruise missiles.

She will have engineering enhancements which will allow her to operate quieter, more reliably, and with improved survivability.

She will be capable of surfacing through the Arctic ice canopy. Most important of all she will be able to operate with unrivaled stealth in any ocean anywhere in the world.

In time of war she will seek out and destroy enemy submarines and surface ships. She will strike targets ashore with her land attack variants of the Tomahawk cruise missile. She will operate unescorted and unsupported. She will carry the battle to the enemy and fight in his own waters at his own doorstep.

In time of peace or limited conflict she will prowl the depths at will in any ocean with complete impunity, her presence unknown to our adversaries. She will be ready to surveil and strike with surprise and awesome strength if so directed in our national interest.

I hope it is clear to all of you that the submarine Jefferson City will be a class all her own:

A true pillar for America's security;

A ship truly worthy to be named for the city of Jefferson.

On the eve of Jefferson City's christening a newspaper reporter asked me: "Why build this ship now that peace is breaking out all over?"

It is not my role to address the controversies surrounding the military budget. Those are decisions for our national leaders. I hope they make wise decisions for us all.

I will however say this—peace did not start breaking out by accident or as a result of paper and good intentions. It was born from American strength, American conviction, and American political acumen.

I found the following words by the author Alexander Kent in a sea novel about the early days of the American Navy. I find them particularly relevant to the construction of the submarine Jefferson City. It reads:

"When Thomas Jefferson suggests a thing you don't argue too much * * * power is heady medicine."

My answer to the reporter's question was simple—The Jefferson must be built to ensure peace keeps breaking out all over.

Those who share feelings of romance. awe, and adventure toward ships and the sea know that a ship is more than steel and wire. A ship has a life and a spirit of her own. The nature of that spirit comes from the men who sail her.

Mrs. Skelton gave the Jefferson City life.

My men have given her a spirit which you can all relish.

Like it or not, I, the men of Jefferson City, and our families are now Missourians regardless of our backgrounds. Therefore, I ask you to ponder these words of John Owen:

God and the sailor we alike adore
But only when in danger, not before:
The danger o' er, both are alike requited,
God is forgotten and the sailor slighted.

Please do not forget us when we dive into the silent sea. We are now part of your history forever.

Fair winds and following seas to you all.

NATIONAL ODYSSEY OF THE MIND

HON. ROBERT G. TORRICELLI

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 7, 1990

Mr. TORRICELLI. Mr. Speaker, it is with great respect and admiration that I address my colleagues in the House today, for I rise to extend my heartiest congratulations and warmest best wishes to the students of Fairmount School for becoming the New Jersey State champions in the National Odyssey of the Mind Tournament. Fairmount School students from grades K–5 won first place in each of the three problems they competed in on Saturday, April 28, 1990.

The Odyssey of the Mind Program is a creative problem solving competition. The first tournament took place in 1978, under the auspices of the New Jersey State Department of Education and has since spread to nearly all 50 States, Canada, China, Mexico, and recently, the Soviet Union. Internationally, over 350,000 students participate in the Odyssey of the Mind Program.

Hackensack students won in three areas, omitronic humor, classics—the seven wonders of the world, and recycle. The omitronic humor team was required to develop and perform a comedy routine or a skit about a comedy routine. In addition the team had to design, build, and operate an original animated character that showed specific reactions and emotions. This omitronic character had to smile, shed tears, look surprised, look bored, and show two reactions or emotions of the team's choosing. The second team won in the area of classics—the seven wonders of the world. This problem required the students to create and present a performance based on the seven wonders of the ancient world. The third winning team was required to develop a nonverbal communication system to guide blindfolded team members through a course laden with trash and obstacles. One team member was the dispatcher. Three blindfolded members had to pick up trash and take it to one of three transfer stations. The other blindfolded team member, had to collect the trash from the transfer stations and take it to the recycling center. The team had to place one container of hazardous waste in the hazardous wastesite.

The three Hackensack teams will now be part of a 13-contingency team representing the State of New Jersey at the Odyssey of the Mind World Finals to be held at Iowa State University from May 20 to June 3.

Mr. Speaker I am proud to join in paying tribute to this exceptional group and extend my best wishes to them in the upcoming Odyssey of the Mind World Finals.

ASSASSINATION OF COLOMBIAN PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATE

HON. CHARLES B. RANGEL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 7, 1990

Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, Colombia last week was horrified by the assassination of Presidential candidate Carlos Pizarro Leon Gomez. He was brutally gunned down with an automatic pistol on a crowded commercial aircraft while on the campaign trail. The "Extraditables", the major Colombian drug traffickers wanted for trial in the United States, quickly took credit for the assassination. Mr. Pizarro was the third presidential candidate to be assassinated by the drug traffickers during this election campaign.

My heart goes out to the family, friends and supporters of Mr. Pizarro, as they mourn the loss of a friend and leader. I also share the outrage that the Colombian people must feel at such heinous attacks on their democracy and freedom.

It is almost impossible for us to imagine the daily horrors and tragic sacrifices of our Colombian friends, who remain bravely steadfast in their commitment to fight the drug traffickers. We must admire the tremendous courage displayed by so many Colombian men and women, and we must do our best to support their efforts.

Colombian President Barco has been most appreciative of the moral support as well as resources the United States has provided to Colombia. However, he has made clear to us the types of long-term assistance that Colombia needs from the world community in order to attain victory over the drug cartels:

Stopping the flow into the Andes of essential chemicals used for the manufacture of cocaine;

Stopping the flow into the Andes of weapons, such as the automatic pistol used against candidate Pizarro;

Depriving drug traffickers of their profits, by conducting financial investigations and cracking down on money laundering; and Reducing the demand for drugs.

Mr. Speaker, we must continue our support of our friends in Colombia, especially during this difficult time, and we must do more to work with the international community to achieve the long-term goals as outlined by President Barco. These goals will benefit the entire community of nations, and failing to achieve them will be a tragedy for us all.

THE 63D APPLE BLOSSOM FESTIVAL

HON. D. FRENCH SLAUGHTER, JR.

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 7, 1990

Mr. SLAUGHTER of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, this past weekend Winchester, VA, celebrated the 63d Apple Blossom Festival. The festival was a wonderful success. For those of you who were not able to be there for the festivities, I would like to submit the following remarks for the benefit of all Members and readers of the RECORD. They were given by Sallie Forman, vice president for government relations of the National Broadcasting Company [NBC].

SHENANDOAH APPLE BLOSSOM FESTIVAL

I'm flattered and delighted by this invitation. There can't be a lovelier setting for making a speech than here among the apple trees in the Shenandoah Valley.

As a representative of network television, I was a little surprised to be asked to address an apple blossom festival. We in the networks love apples as much as anybody, but sometimes in carrying out our journalistic duties we have to report on the occasional worm.

I know that a lot of people would prefer that TV news focus more on other aspects of the apple, like how shiny and red it is. But that might be because it had been sprayed with alar, and we'd have to report that too. There's no way conscientious journalism can avoid getting into controversy and making some folks mad.

The alar controversy is an example of how, even with the best intentions, people step on toes. It's an occupational hazard that both the media and people in government have in common. President Bush, for example, has an extremely low popularity rating on the broccoli farms of this Nation.

Government and the media find themselves in the role of adversaries a lot of the time. And that is as it should be in a democracy. But in a way, we're both in the same boat.

We're both dealing with a society full of change, conflict, and contradictions. The U.S.A. is always on the move, and always transforming itself, and the national media have to try to keep up with it. We in the networks are caught in the never-ending task of trying to figure out our pluralistic society, so that we can meet its ever-new requirements in information and entertainment.

This year NBC is celebrating 50 years as a television network, and the story of the half-century is really the story of a long and bumpy love affair with the public. We've wooed the American people in a hundred ways, and in a hundred costumes.

When NBC-TV and the other networks started out in the late forties with a regular schedule of programs, we tried TV versions of hit radio shows like "The Goldbergs". We literally took the radio script and had actors read it on camera. But it soon became apparent that what drew people to this newfangled video gadget was something to look at, not to listen to.

And what caught their attention was pretty silly stuff: Milton Berle all gussied up in an evening gown—or wearing only a barrel and suspenders. That buck-toothed comic on "The Texaco Star Theater", using vaudeville sight gags, skyrocketed the sales of TV sets and helped establish television as the prime national pastime. (By the way Uncle Miltie's technique still can be seen on NBC—if you've ever caught Willard Scott dressed as Carmen Miranda).

The Texaco Theater ultimately ran out of gas, and in the fifties NBC devised a host of other formats: The tiny puppet theater of "Kukla, Fran and Ollie", the huge sound stage of the "the Kraft Television Theater", and the two-hour extravaganza of "Your Show of Shows". It was one of the most fertile periods of TV history. Two of our experiments turned out to be particularly durable: The early-morning information show, "Today", and the late-night and entertainment show, "Tonight".

Then came a phase when the public developed a huge craving for TV westerns—in one season there were as many as 30 horse operas on the air; NBC came with one of the best and longest-running: "Bonanza", on the tube for 14 years.

The westerns have ridden off into the sunset. But there is one area of programming where the public's interest has never been in doubt: sports. We've been reminded of that throughout the decades.

In 1947 NBC telecast the world series for the first time and drew the first real mass audience in TV history, nearly four million people—most of then sitting in bars. Another indicator was the famous time in 1968 when NBC cut from the last crucial minutes of a New York Jets/Oakland Raiders football game to show a movie "Heidi". Well maybe we didn't disappoint the children's audience, but our switchboard was swamped with protests as never before or since. And there's one sure reminder of the huge popularity of TV sports; whenever there's a commercial break in the Super Bowl, water pressure goes down in cities all across the land.

Television and society went through a sea of change in the late sixties and early seventies. That was when the rending issues of Vietnam and civil rights bred so much doubt and division in the Nation. Our programming reflected that, and by reflecting it we sometimes drew the change that television itself was to blame for the dissension. There was a temptation to blame the messenger for the message. That was understandable. America in those years was steering an unfamiliar course, and television news was the window on a stormy present and uncertain future. People sat in their living rooms in front of their TV sets and saw history happening suddenly and violently before their eyes—from the rice paddies of Vietnam to the streets of Birmingham and Chicago.

But in its best moments television stepped in to forge unity and consensus. It could unite the Nation in grief, as on the weekend of John Kennedy's death. Or it could unite people in laughter. "Rowan and Martin's Laugh-In" scored a great hit on NBC by holding up many of our most cherished institutions to ridicule; even Richard Nixon appeared on the show saying "Sock It To Me". A few years later, that became a rather prophetic remark.

The 1970's brought in the age of "relevance" in entertainment programming. In dramatic series, "The Bold Ones" showed a new breed of senator, lawyer and doctor challenging the old ways of doing things. NBC was the first network to introduce black performers as stars of their own TV series, with Bill Cosby in "I Spy" and Diahann Carroll in "Julia". And NBC's miniseries "Holocaust" stirred the conscience of millions by dramatizing the moral issue of genocide.

News took on an importance it never had in the days of 15-minute news casts by John Cameron Swayze. NBC lengthened its evening newscasts to half an hour, and the team of Chet Huntley and David Brinkley on NBC brought a new intelligence and wit to political reporting.

Since then, television has gone on serving the mood and need of the time. It can serve up something as trivial and zany as "Late Night With David Letterman". Or it can make gripping drama out of social issues on "L.A. Law", or in the docudrama "Roe vs. Wade".

With satellite transmission, miniaturized cameras and eletronic editing now commonplace, TV news is more capable than ever of bringing far-off reality into the living room. Last year we saw the Berlin Wall suddenly turned into "The Berlin Mall". East Germans were milling past the Brandenburg Gate for a look at freedom. It was a great moment . . . and our cameras were there. Even before the world's leaders had time to react, American viewers were sharing the euphoria as it was happening.

So, all in all, as we look back on this 50-Year affair between television and the public, we can say we've surmounted the hurdles. Televison networks and their hundreds of affiliated stations around the country such as NBC affiliates WRC-TV, Channel 4 in Washington and WHAG-TV Channel 25 in Hagertown that serve your area have engaged in a tireless effort to program to national and local tastes, and to bring audiences to advertisers.

The result has made the American system of free over-the-air televison the most successful in the world, and today we see many other nations emulating us—shifting from state control to free competition in broadcasting.

But the current decade, the decade of the nineties, presents a new kind of change that the networks have to deal with. It's a change not in public tastes, but in the marketplace. The competitive environment of the networks has been transformed by the growth of alternative ways of delivering television to the viewer.

In the space of just ten years, independent television stations have grown from 120 to more than 400. Cable penetration has expended from 21 to 56 percent of television homes. There are upwards of 30 very sizeable cable networks. VCR's comparatively rare ten years ago, are now in two out of every three homes. Video stores have become as prevalent as pizza parlors.

So the three major networks have become part of a much larger crowd competing for the viewer's attention. Ten years ago, a TV viewer had an average of 10 channels to choose from. Today it's more than 30. With so many more programming choices, it's natural that the networks' share of TV audience has eroded. The networks have lost nearly a quarter of their audience share since 1980. It's down to 65 percent today, likely to go lower.

When audience share goes down so does advertising revenue, and so do profits. ABC, CBS and NBC depend almost entirely on advertising income to pay for their programming. Cable on the other hand, can finance itself from two sources—subscription fees and advertising. That may be one reason why the total revenues of the cable industry now surpass those of all broadcast stations, and their cash flow is running more than double that of broadcasters.

Besides the competition for audience and ad revenues, these alternative media compete for program sources. It's now a seller's market in the sale of program rights and sports rights, and the price of getting something to put on a network schedule as gone sky high.

"The Cosby Show" for instance is great television, but is doesn't come cheap. NBC just signed that top-rated show for the 7th season. Shortly after we signed, one of the "Cosby" producers went out and bought the San Diego Padres.

Sports rights are through the roof and into the stratosphere. To get the 1992 Barcelona Summer Olympics, NBC is paying half a billion in rights and production costs. CBS paid an astounding $1.1 billion for major league baseball over the next four years.

And all that news coverage that everybody expects from the networks is a growing burden on the network budgets—not just the regular newscasts but the specials on everything from a space launch to a summit meeting. More has to be spent on satellite leasing and the high-tech hardware. NBC alone has lost close to half a billion dollars on its news operations over the last decade.

Increasing competition, a diminishing share of audience and ad revenues, rising costs—it all adds up to a very different world for the networks in the nineties—a much less friendly environment. What to do when you find yourself in a change situation? Adapt.

That's what NBC is doing. The peacock has always been an adaptable bird. Just as our programming has changed with the countless changes in public tastes over the years, so our business activity is reforming itself to the realities of the new marketplace.

First, we recognize a new role for our company. While our core business remains—and will remain—over-the-air networking, we see ourselves primarily as a programming company. In the spirit of the times, we recognize that there is not just one way of getting programming to the home screen. There are many ways. And, as for as regulations permit, we are trying to program for a variety of video services.

We also recognize that the traditional boundaries that separate one kind of media company from another are gone. In a media world that produces vertically-integrated combinations like Time-Warner and the Rupert Murdock empire, and Sony-Columbia, there are no hard-and-fast barriers.

So the peacock is growing some new feathers. We're not allowed under current regulations to get into some areas of the business many of our competitors are in, like syndication, financial interest in programs, cable system ownership. But we are branching out and trying to broaden our base.

We've taken major steps into the cable business. NBC has a programming partnership with one of the Nation's leading systems operators, Cablevision, Inc. We share an interest in 12 different cable program services. One of these is one we launched ourselves just one year ago—CNBC, the consumer news and business channel.

This network-cable marriage has opened some exciting new opportunities for service to the public. In Olympics coverage. Added to our free over-the-air coverage of 160 hours of the Barcelona games, we'll offer a package of 600 additional hours over several cable channels, on a pay-per-view basis, we think the Barcelona Olympics will be an eye opener to everybody on how broadcast and cable TV can enhance each other to viewer benefit.

Another example is a proposed venture into outer space, into the still unrealized realm of direct broadcast satellite. We've reached a tentative agreement with three partners to launch a DBS service in late 1993, and we're calling it sky cable. Sky cable would be different from previous ventures in DBS; it would beam from a satellite transmitter so powerful that as many as 108 channels can be received in the home on an antenna the size of a table napkin. The device could be bought for only about $400 dollars.

Just as we've crossed barriers to do business in cable and DBS, we're also venturing into new arrangements overseas—with visnews in the U.K., for added strength in world news coverage, and we've tied in with new broadcast affiliates in Australia and New Zealand.

None of this signifies an abandonment of NBC's traditional role in free over-the-air network service, our most important contribution to the life of America for five decades.

In today's vastly changed communications marketplace, it has become imperative to broaden our business base in order to preserve the health and viability of our basic network service.

We do have a number of disadvantages.

The networks, as some of you may know, are just about the only business in today's free-wheeling media world that are subject to heavy government regulation. Deregulation never happened for us, and as I noted a few moments ago, this bars us from some of the most profitable areas of television today.

Under what are called the financial interest and syndication rules, a network cannot share in the profits of a program after its network showing. It can't engage in syndication. And its right to produce its own programming has been severely limited. These measures were adopted 20 years ago, when the networks were thought to dominate the television market. Hollywood studios have an interest in keeping the rules in force, and so far their lobbying effort has prevailed.

Why should the public care whether the networks are freed of these regulations?

For one thing, it makes little sense to hamper the competitiveness of America's most important media companies at a time when foreign owners are free to move in and buy up chunks of our entertainment industry.

It seems absurd that Sony and Murdock are free to form vertically integrated structures and controlling both program production and distribution, and yet the three American network companies cannot do the same. There should be a level playing field for everyone.

The U.S. network system provides a unique grass-roots connection to local communities through affiliated stations. There is no other medium that provides this kind of local and national service to a mass audience. And there is no other medium that serves the economy so well as a mass marketing tool.

Finally, the networks help us to cohere as a nation. Through programs like "Roots" and "All In the Family" and "The Cosby Show", network viewing helps remind us that we are united in our diversity. It has been a force for tolerance, sympathy and understanding in modern America. Television news has helped us through some of our roughest and tensest moments as a nation.

With our society fractionalizing into ever smaller and more private worlds, there are fewer and fewer occasions that bring our country together. The Presidential elections is one of them. And simultanenous viewing of free over-the-air network television is another. It's hard these days to think of many more.

Whether it's something as serious as a speech from the White House or as breezy as a Bob Hope special, whether it's nightly news or a Super Bowl spectacular, it is a common experience that Americans everywhere can share.

Sharing in the good things is what makes this country great. In fact, it's what we're doing here today at the Shenandoah festival. I don't want to keep you any longer from the pleasures of the day, so I'll say thank you again for hearing me and for letting me be a part of this lovely occasion.

THE WEYMOUTH COUNCIL ON AGING: CELEBRATING 30 YEARS OF SERVICE TO THE COMMUNITY

HON. BRIAN J. DONNELLY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 7, 1990

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay a special tribute to the people of the Weymouth Council on Aging, of Weymouth, MA, who today are celebrating the 30th anniversary of their creation.

The resolution creating the Weymouth Council on Aging was unanimously adopted at the annual town meeting in 1960. The council was formed to coordinate and carry out programs designed to meet the problems of the aging, in conjunction with the State Council on Aging. The 11 member council is made up of local elected officials and appointed residents of the town of Weymouth.

The Council on Aging provides numerous services to the senior citizens on the Weymouth community. It provides information and referral on existing programs, and offers outreach and counseling services to area seniors. It runs an Alzheimer's support group and health screening clinics. The council also coordinates transportation to various programs and locations in the community for area seniors. This service is particularly important because it allows senior citizens to retain their freedom and independence.

Mr. Speaker, these are just a few examples of the many important programs that the council has provided to the senior citizens of Weymouth during its first 30 years. It has been my great pleasure to work with the people of the Weymouth Council on Aging. I am confident that the council will continue to provide quality services to the Weymouth community for many years to come.

HABEAS CORPUS REVISION ACT OF 1990

HON. ROBERT W. KASTENMEIER

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 7, 1990

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to introduce a bill that would revise the procedures by which State prisoners may seek habeas corpus relief in the Federal courts. Habeas corpus is an issue that has long been of interest to me, and to the Subcommittee on Courts, Intellectual Property, and the Administration of Justice, which I chair. My subcommittee will hold 2 days of hearings on the issue on May 16 and May 24.

A habeas corpus proceeding is the vehicle by which prisoners can obtain judicial review of the process that culminated in their incarceration. It has been a mainstay of our Nation's judicial system for more than a century. Over the course of the past two decades, habeas corpus litigation has given rise to an increasingly complex, confusing, and sometimes unfair body of law.

My bill recognizes that States and the American public have a legitimate interest in ensuring that this country's criminal laws are effectively enforced, that criminal cases move through the system efficiently and with appropriate speed, and that these cases be thoroughly considered and fairly decided.

There is virtual unanimity of opinion among interested observers that the time has now come for Congress to revisit and revise the habeas corpus laws, in particular as they relate to prisoners who have been sentenced to death. The efforts of several illustrious groups reflect the need to enhance the fairness and efficiency of these laws. The Powell Committee, composed of several esteemed Federal judges and chaired by retired Supreme Court Justice Lewis Powell, issued its report last fall. The full judicial conference reviewed and revised the Powell Committee's report, and made its recommendations early this year. An American Bar Association task force, comprised of representatives of all sectors of the legal community, held a series of hearings around the country, and reported its results last fall. In addition, there are several bills pending in both houses of Congress that would revise the habeas corpus rules in a variety of ways.

My bill accepts three major premises of these various proposals. First, the death penalty will continue to be imposed for certain crimes. Second, the Federal habeas corpus review process is an important part of our criminal justice system. Third, there are serious problems with the current process and it must be revised so that it is more efficient, expeditious, consistent, and fair.

None of the proposals will completely eliminate delay between a sentence of death and final review of that sentence. Delay is appropriate. No civilized society would want to impose a death sentence without knowing that it was fairly and fully considered and imposed. All of the proposals recognize, therefore, that while they will reduce delay somewhat, they will not eliminate it entirely.

These groups and individuals also agree that the Congress needs to address certain key issues and my bill does so. For example, current law does not sufficiently encourage timely initiation of habeas proceedings, so my bill provides a 1-year statute of limitations in capital cases.

In order to complete all appropriate stay and Federal review processes, prisoners facing death sentences must now seek stays of execution on a haphazard, case-by-case basis. To avoid these frenzied eleventh-hour efforts to obtain stays, my bill requires automatic stays until all review is completed.

It is in everyone's interest that all legitimate issues be raised and thoroughly aired as early in the process as possible. The bill therefore encourages the resolution of all claims in the trial courts, rather than through Federal habeas corpus proceedings. In particular, it clarifies the circumstances in which a prisoner will be deemed to have defaulted for failure to raise a claim in State proceedings. It promotes resolution of any remaining claims that are not resolved by the States in a single habeas proceeding, rather than by multiple petitions.

The bill dispenses with the requirement that a court certify appeals of denials of habeas petitions, since in capital cases these appeals are always appropriate.

The better the legal assistance in the first instance, the less need prisoners will have to later attack their convictions. The bill therefore creates a mechanism for the appointment of qualified counsel in capital cases. This provision not only makes judicial proceedings fairer, but it also conserves scarce judicial resources.

The other bills that are pending were introduced before all of the expert analysis on the habeas corpus issue had been completed. Some were introduced before the ABA task force reported, some before the full judicial conference acted, and some even before the Powell Committee issued its recommendations. My bill capitalizes on the collective wisdom of all of the groups and individuals that have studied habeas corpus law extensively. I believe that it is therefore the optimal proposal for a much needed revision of the law. I look forward to the hearings on May 16 and 24, and to a fair and prompt resolution of this complex issue.

H.R. —

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Habeas Corpus Revision Act of 1990".

SEC. 2. LIMITATIONS PERIOD IN CAPITAL CASES.

Section 2254 of title 28, United States Code, is amended by adding after subsection (f) the following:

"(g)(1) In the case of an applicant under sentence of death, any application for habeas corpus relief under this section must be filed in the appropriate district court within one year from the following date, whichever is appropriate:

"(A) The date of denial of a writ of certiorari, if a petition for a writ of certiorari to the highest court of the State on direct appeal from the conviction and sentence is timely filed in the Supreme Court.

"(B) The date of issuance of the mandate of the highest court of the State on direct appeal from the conviction and sentence, if a petition for a writ of certiorari is not filed in the Supreme Court.

"(C) The date of issuance of the mandate of the Supreme Court, if on a petition of a writ of certiorari the Surpeme Court, upon consideration of the case, disposes of it in a manner that leaves the captial sentence undisturbed.

"(2) The time requirements established by this section shall be tolled—

"(A) during any period in which the applicant is not represented by counsel as described in section 8 of the Habeas Corpus Revision Act of 1990;

"(B) during the period from the date the applicant files an application for State postconviction relief until final disposition of the application by the State appellate courts and the Supreme Court, if all filing deadlines are met;

"(C) during any period authorized by law for the filing of any petitions for rehearing and similar petitions, if all filing deadlines are met; and

"(D) during an additional period not to exceed 90 days, if counsel moves for an extension in the district court that would have jurisdiction of a habeas corpus application and makes a showing of good cause.

"(3) The sanction for failure to comply with the time requirements established by this section shall be dismissal, except that the time requirements shall be waived if—

"(A) the applicant presents a colorable claim, not previously presented, of factual innocence or ineligibility for a capital sentence; or

"(B) other exceptional circumstances warrant a waiver.".

SEC. 3. STAYS OF EXECUTION IN CAPITAL CASES.

Section 2251 of title 28, United States Codes, is amended—

(1) by inserting "(a)(1)" before the first paragraph;

(2) by inserting "(2)" before the second paragraph; and

(3) by adding at the end the following:

"(b) In the case of an individual under sentence of death, a warrant or order setting an execution date shall be stayed upon application to any court that would have jurisdiction over an application for habeas corpus under this chapter. SEC. 4. SUCCESSIVE PETITIONS IN CAPITAL CASES.

Section 2244(b) of title 28, United States Code, is amended—

(1) by inserting "(1)" after "(b)"; and

(2) by adding at the end the following:

"(2) In the case of an applicant under sentence of death, a second or successive application presenting a claim not previously presented by the applicant in an application under this chapter shall be dismissed unless—

"(A) the failure to raise the claim previously is—

"(i) the result of interference by State officials;

"(ii) the result of Supreme Court recognition of a new Federal right that is retroactively applicable; or

"(iii) the result of the discovery of facts that could not have been discovered previously by the exercise of reasonable diligence; or

"(B) the facts underlying the claim would be sufficient, if proven, to undermine the court's confidence in the applicant's guilt of the offense or offenses for which the capital sentence was imposed or the appropriateness of that sentence; or

"(C) consideration of the application is necessary to prevent a miscarriage of justice.

"(3) In the case of an applicant under sentence of death, a second or successive application under this chapter shall be dismissed unless the interests of justice would be served by reconsideration of the claim.".

SEC. 5. CERTIFICATES OF PROBABLE CAUSE.

The third paragraph of section 2253, title 28, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"An appeal may not be taken to the court of appeals from the final order in a habeas corpus proceeding where the detention complained of arises out of process issued by a State court, unless the justice or judge who rendered the order or a circuit justice or judge issues a certificate of probable cause. However, an applicant under sentence of death shall have a right of appeal without a certificate of probable cause, except after denial of a second application.".

SEC. 6. LAW APPLICABLE IN CHAPTER 153 PROCEEDINGS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Chapter 153 of title 28, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following:

"§ 2256. Law applicable

"(a) Except as provided in subsection (b) of this section, each claim under this chapter shall be governed by the law existing on the date the court considers the claim.

"(b) The court may decline to apply a new rule if applying that new rule would—

"(1) fail to serve the purpose of the new rule;

"(2) upset State authorities' reasonable reliance on a different rule; and

"(3) seriously disrupt the administration of justice.

"(c) For purposes of this section, a new rule is a sharp break from precedent that positively changes the law from that governing at the time the claimant's sentence became final. A rule is not new merely because, based on precedent existing before the rule's announcement, it was susceptible to debate among reasonable minds.

"(d) For purposes of this section, a claimant's sentence becomes final at the conclusion of State court appellate and collateral litigation on the claimant's conviction and sentence and any direct review in the Supreme Court of the United States.' "

"(1)(A) the applicant previously failed to raise the claim in State court at the time and in the manner prescribed by State law;

"(B) the State courts, for that reason refused to entertain the claim; and

"(C) such refusal would constitute an adequate and independent State law ground that would foreclosure direct review of the State court judgment in the Supreme Court of the United States; and

"(2) the applicant fails to show cause for the failure to raise the claim in State court and predjudice to the applicant's right to fair proceedings or to an accurate outcome resulting from the alleged violation of the Federal right asserted, or that failure to consider the claim would result in a miscarriage of justice.

"(3) For purposes of this subsection, cause is an explanation for procedural default not attributable to an intentional decision to ignore a State's procedural rules. An applicant may establish cause by showing that—

"(A) the factual or legal basis of the claim could not have been discovered by the exercise of reasonable diligence before the applicant could have raised the claim in State court, or was not discovered or asserted because the applicant's counsel failed to exerice reasonable diligence;

"(B) the claim relies on a retroactive proposition of law announced after the applicant might have raised the claim in State court;

FESTA ITALIANA

HON. MATTHEW J. RINALDO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 7, 1990

Mr. RINALDO. Mr. Speaker, over 20 million American citizens make up the Italian community throughout the United States, including many who live in my home State of New Jersey.

From one generation to the next, they have enriched our State's culture, social and business life, and strengthened their communities through many acts of public service.

For the 20th year, Italian-Americans in New Jersey will join together to celebrate their heritage at the Festa Italiana at the Garden State Arts Center. Italian food, music, art, dance, and artifacts will be on display as part of this 2-day festival on June 16 and 17.

It will attract thousands of residents of the Garden State and raise funds to enable senior citizens, the handicapped and disabled, veterans, and disadvantaged schoolchildren to attend dance and music performances at the Garden State Arts Center.

The Festa Italiana calls attention to the contributions and assimilation of millions of Italian-Americans in our society. As one of the largest ethnic groups in New Jersey, Italian-Americans have contributed to our State's rich heritage in education, medicine, science, business, the professions, the arts, and building trades.

Italian-Americans rank first in New Jersey with some 831,000 residents claiming to be born of Italian parents, according to the New Jersey State Data Center.

New Jersey is indeed proud that we have elected the first Italian-American as our Governor. A former Member of Congress, Governor James Florio proudly identifies himself as an Italian-American whose roots are a reminder of the efforts, sacrifices, and struggles of Italian immigrant families in becoming citizens of this country and in the success of their children and grandchildren in fulfilling the American dream.

In recognition of the achievements of Italian-Americans and of Christopher Columbus' discovery, Congress last year designated the month of October as "Italian-American Heritage Month." All across this Nation, festivals, concerts, and a celebration of the arts took place to honor the Italian-American people. As we approach the 500th anniversary of Columbus' historic journey to America, we take pride in our traditions and pass on our heritage to future generations.

The Festa Italiana on June 16 and 17 is due to the efforts of many Italian-American organizations in bringing together the skills, traditions, and creative talents of New Jersey residents who take pride in our State and in their Italian heritage.

I extend to the Festa Italiana committee men and women and the participating organizations my best wishes for another successful event that celebrates the accomplishments and history of Italian-Americans in the State of New Jersey.

SENATE—Tuesday, May 8, 1990

(Legislative day of Wednesday, April 18, 1990)

The Senate met at 11 a.m., and was called to order by the Honorable CHARLES S. ROBB, a Senator from the State of Virginia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Today's prayer will be offered by the guest Chaplain, the Reverend Dr. Roger Fredrikson, retired, American Baptist from Sioux Falls, SD.

PRAYER

The Reverend Dr. Roger Fredrikson, retired, American Baptist of Sioux Falls, SD, offered the following prayer:

Let us pray:

But they that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength; they shall mount up with wings as eagles; they shall run, and not be weary; and they shall walk, and not faint.

We come to You the living God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob and the Father of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, grateful for Your steadfast faithfulness and for Your loving mercy which is new every morning. We acknowledge our dependence on You, the everlasting God.

Bless our beloved country and all its people—the rich and the poor, the great and the small. Bind us together as a family of hope. Heal our brokenness, cleanse our public life, and restore to us a spirit of righteousness.

Lord, bless the men and women of the Senate called to high, demanding responsibilities. Fill them with Your spirit of wisdom and humility and grace. Grant them a vision of Your kingdom and the courage to do what is right for the common good of all people.

In the name of Christ. Amen.

APPOINTMENT OF ACTING PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will please read a communication to the Senate from the President pro tempore [Mr. BYRD].

The legislative clerk read the following letter:

U.S. SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, DC, May 8, 1990.

To the Senate:

Under the provisions of rule I, section 3, of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby appoint the Honorable CHARLES S. ROBB, a Senator from the State of Virginia, to perform the duties of the Chair.

ROBERT C. BYRD,
President pro tempore.

Mr. ROBB thereupon assumed the chair as Acting President pro tempore.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the standing order the majority leader is recognized.

THE JOURNAL

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Journal of the proceedings be approved to date.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SCHEDULE

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, this morning following the time for the two leaders there will be a period for morning business not to extend beyond 11:30 a.m., with Senators permitted to speak therein for up to 5 minutes each.

At 11:30, the Senate will resume consideration of S. 135, the Hatch Act reform bill; the time between 11:30 and 12 noon will be for debate on that bill, equally divided and controlled by Senators GLENN and ROTH.

At noon today the Senate will begin voting on three amendments which were debated yesterday. Those are amendments numbered 1585, 1586, and 1587. The first vote beginning at noon will be a 15-minute vote. The two succeeding votes will be 10 minutes in duration.

Upon the conclusion of the rollcall vote on the third such vote, that is on amendment No. 1587, the Senate will recess until 2:15 p.m., in order to accommodate the party conference luncheons.

At 2:15, when the Senate resumes in session, consideration of the Hatch Act reform amendments will continue.

As I stated previously on several occasions, including yesterday, it is my intention to complete action on this measure this week, hopefully in the early part of the week.

RESERVATION OF LEADER TIME

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my leader time and I reserve all of the leader time of the Republican leader.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MORNING BUSINESS

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order there will now be a period for the transaction of morning business not to extend beyond 11:30 a.m., with Senators permitted to speak therein for not to exceed 5 minutes each.

THE GUEST CHAPLAIN, THE REVEREND DR. ROGER FREDRIKSON

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I am very proud the prayer in the Senate today was given by Dr. Roger Fredrikson, of South Dakota. I am pleased to say that his lovely wife, Ruth, and Merle and Sharon Johnson were in my office earlier this morning.

He is the previous pastor of the First Baptist Church of Sioux Falls, having previously been pastor of the First Baptist Church of Wichita, KS. I note the presence of our colleague from Kansas here.

He is active in the Baptist World Alliance and American Baptist Churches.

His son, Randy Fredrikson is pastor of the First Baptist Church in Brookings, SD. I first met his son Randy in, I believe, 1968 or 1969. I lived, in 1968, at Cambridge, MA, when I was at Harvard Law School, and he was in the divinity school. So it is a family that has devoted itself to the service of our people and we are just very proud to have Dr. Roger Fredrikson in our midst today.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

DISPOSING OF REAL ESTATE HELD BY THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I see in the morning paper that the RTC is going to go forward in disposing of the real estate that has been accumulated by the Federal Government through the failure of many of the savings and loans around the country. There are many, many billions of dollars that the Government holds in real estate. Mention is made that of the vast holdings of repossessed lands, in the event they are sold, that the buildings will drag down prices of privately owned property and further depress real estate markets.

● This "bullet" symbol identifies statements or insertions which are not spoken by a Member of the Senate on the floor.

That is an interesting comment, and I would like to talk about one of the possible solutions to that that I have spoken about with various members of the RTC and the Treasury as well. I would not personally like to own a piece of real estate that I have survived some difficult times with and suddenly find the adjoining piece of real estate sold at a much lower price and have my piece not able to compete rentwise with my new neighbor.

I felt that one of the ways of reducing the loss that the RTC will surely suffer is to restore some of the old tax rules, the passive tax rules that preceded the 1986 tax law to these properties. In the event that a person buys these properties and would be able to deduct the passive losses of these properties against other incomes as is not now allowed by the tax law but which was allowed, additional value would inure to the piece of property that is being sold by the RTC and the losses of the RTC and the Government would thereby be less.

Or, for instance, it might be that special capital gains rules are applied to the buildings, the real estate that is sold by the RTC and that, too, will make that property more advantageous and more appealing to prospective buyers and, as a result, perhaps more could be realized for those properties by the RTC with a resulting lower loss to taxpayers and also with greater equity to other landowners who find property around them now owned by the Federal Government sold at distressed prices and at prices so low that those who, as I say, have worked their way through a difficult period now find themselves with a neighbor with whom they are unable to compete.

So the idea of restoring some of the passive loss rules to this property and the idea of allowing special capital gains rates to apply to this property might be most helpful. There are some problems, however. What happens to the transfer of that property? Would the passive loss rules follow the property or would they only be available to the first owner? It is not clear in my mind what the answer to that question should be; furthermore, whether or not the passive loss rules could continue for a specific period of time rather than only with the initial owner.

I think those are the kind of things that have to be worked out, but it may, indeed, be a most useful and most positive idea to not only reduce the RTC losses but to make these properties more valuable and make these properties not a drag on people who have, as I say, seen their own properties through difficult times and who really do not deserve to have a new neighbor foisted upon them by low prices from the RTC that makes them noncompetitive. I am going to work on these ideas, Mr. President, together with my staff and see if we cannot flesh them out a little bit and present them to the RTC in a more, perhaps, complete method. I yield the floor.

Mr. GRASSLEY addressed the Chair.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRASSLEY].

SMALL BUSINESS WEEK 1990

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, this week, May 6 to May 12, has been designated as Small Business Week in honor of our Nation's 20 million small businesses. America's small business owners make great contributions to the economy by taking risks, making personal sacrifices, and persisting until their own version of the American dream comes true.

According to information from the Small Business Administration, small businesses employ 6 of every 10 workers, account for the majority of new jobs created, and provide 2 of every 3 workers with their first jobs. Also, more than half of all innovations developed during the 20th century were due to the efforts of small businesses.

Mr. President, this is indeed a very impressive listing of accomplishments. And I am confident America's small businesses will with equal success conquer new challenges—increasing productivity, developing new markets, and competing in the international marketplace.

Congress needs to be mindful of the challenges faced by America's small business owners and we should not create more obstacles or problems for them. Increasing Government regulations and paperwork requirements are some of the overwhelming challenges which all small business owners must face. Congress, unfortunately, has been responsible for this mountain of paperwork and therefore must take an active role in alleviating the burden.

To recognize outstanding small business owners, SBA has selected a notable entrepreneur from each State, the District of Columbia, and Puerto Rico/Virgin Islands as the State Small Business Person of the Year. I want to congratulate these individuals and recognize Iowa's Small Business Person of the Year, Mr. Vernon "Barney" Roberts, chairman of Iowa Office Supply, located in Storm Lake, IA. The company he and his wife began in their home in 1967 has grown tremendously—from 2 employees to 55, and sales which have increased from $95,000 to $8.5 million.

Along with Mr. Roberts, all of Iowa's small business owners are to be commended for contributing to the economic stability of our State, for their pioneering spirit in developing our rural communities, and for truly making Iowa "a place to grow."

"Small Business: Leading America into the 21st Century" is the theme for this year's Small Business Week. This appropriately reflects the leadership role small businesses have as our Nation enters the next century. Small businesses, facing the challenges of the future, will continue to create new jobs, new opportunities and new innovations for America.

Mr. President, I am taking this opportunity not only to honor our small businesses as the backbone of our Nation's economy, but to also remind my colleagues of the importance of restraining our actions so that we do not stifle the success of our small business owners.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The absence of a quorum has been suggested. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ABOLISHING POLITICAL ACTION COMMITTEES

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, we have pending before us when the Senate begins to vote later on this morning an amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Wyoming, Mr. SIMPSON, and the minority leader, Mr. DOLE.

This amendment provides that the reforms included in S. 135 pending before us would not be allowed to take effect, in essence, until all political action committees are abolished, the theory being that there is too much money going into political action committees and I suppose the theory being the political action committees specifically formed by those who are Federal employees have an influence on the political system that is not wholesome.

Mr. President, taken in isolation, I certainly have never opposed any amendment which would reduce the influence of political action committees on the political process. Almost 9 years ago the then Senator from Arizona, Barry Goldwater, and I introduced the first piece of legislation that would have done away with the right of political action committees to make contributions to influence campaigns. For almost a decade I have attempted to lead an effort to do exactly that through the legislative process.

There have been several other campaign reform bills introduced including one offered by myself and the President pro tempore of the Senate, the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. BYRD]. We had a record number of cloture votes attempting to pass that legislation. A clear majority of the Members of the Senate favored it, but unfortunately, because of a filibuster on the other side of the aisle, we were not able to bring it to a final vote for passage. If we had done so, we would have already taken action to stop the runaway spending in campaigns, to reduce the influence of special interests in campaigns.

Mr. President, we have a cancer that is eating away at the heart of the political process. That cancer is composed of two main elements: Too much money being pumped into the election process, and too much of it coming from special interest groups.

When I first ran for the Senate 12 years ago, the average cost of a winning U.S. Senate race was $600,000. This last year, the average cost of a winning U.S. Senate race in an average, small State was well over $4 million. This means, Mr. President, that Members of the Senate, if they are to raise just the average amount—not the amount it takes in a large State where the figures have been as high as almost $20 million but just in the average size State—must raise $15,000 in campaign contributions every single week without exception for 6 years.

Mr. President, that increase in campaign spending has been fueled by an increase of money coming from special interests. Over half the Members of Congress who were elected last time received more than half of their contributions not from individuals in their home States, not from people at the grassroots, but from special interest groups, political action committees, and others outside their home States aimed at influencing the political process.

At the same time, in that 12-year period while campaign spending has soared, the amount of money pumped into the process from political action committees has increased from about $40 million to about $160 million. Clearly, the increase of money coming from special interests has been the principal source fueling this runaway spending on campaigns, spending which means that Members of Congress are spending their time not taking care of the people's business, not grappling with the challenges we face, but figuring out how in the world they are going to raise the money to get reelected. This is a process that also makes it difficult for challengers with new ideas to have a chance to get elected. In the last election cycle, incumbents outspent challengers by more than two to one because of a greater ability to raise money.

No Senator feels stronger than I that we ought to put an end to this money chase, an end to this runaway spending in campaigns, an end to special influence in campaign funding. But this is not the right way to do it.

Mr. President, for us to go ahead and begin to piecemeal, take every single sector and treat them differently, and, say, all right, until political action committees are abolished these reforms which really limit the rightful political activity of Federal employees will not take effect. That is not a fair way to proceed. In my opinion, it also reduces the likelihood that we will be able to get reform on a comprehensive basis.

Mr. President, we have a serious national problem. We do not need to nibble away at it. We do not need to try to piecemeal it. We need to build pressure for comprehensive reform. We need a comprehensive plan that will in essence do away with the influence of all political action committees, that will end undue influence by all special interest money in politics, and will get overall spending under control in the process.

We have introduced a bill on our side of the aisle. The distinguished majority leader, Senator MITCHELL, and others have introduced a bill. A bill has been introduced on the other side of the aisle. The distinguished minority leader, Senator DOLE, and others have introduced it. Both bills in essence would remove all political action committees from the process of trying to influence elections in an effort to reduce the influence of special interest money.

I think we reduce the possibility that we will get comprehensive reform by linking one bill to another. It is not fair anyway, as long as the process is going to be one that has political action committees in it; it is not fair to say to one group you alone cannot have this weapon in the political process but everyone else will still have it. The only way to deal fairly with the system is comprehensively. That is what we need, comprehensive reform, everyone on the level playing field, and one special interest group not given any special advantage over another.

So, Mr. President, while I certainly am sympathetic with the effort to reduce the influence of political action committees, this is not the way to do it.

I am opposed to this amendment because I believe that its passage would reduce our ability to get comprehensive reelection reform instead of increase our ability to get reform that the entire system so badly needs.

I thank the Chair.

ASHA SERVICE AWARD

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, during March of this year one of our colleagues received a very important award. I would like all of us to be aware of the recognition Senator TOM HARKIN, of Iowa, has received for his outstanding leadership in increasing the public's understanding of communication disorders. He has been honored for his tireless advocacy for people with communication disorders and related disabilities. Senator TOM HARKIN was awarded the American Speech-Language-Hearing Association's highest honor, the Distinguished Service Award.

Approximately 24.5 million Americans currently have communication disorders, including 3 million schoolage children with speech and language impairments and 9 million elderly citizens with hearing impairments.

For nearly 65 years, the American Speech-Language-Hearing Association [ASHA] has been the organization responsible for training, research, and service in the area of communicative disorders. Approximately 60,000 members of ASHA work in a wide range of settings including public schools, colleges and universities, hospitals, clinics, rehabilitation and home health agencies, Veterans' Administration and Department of Defense facilities, and in private practice.

ASHA has played an important role as an advocate for improving opportunities, access, and services for individuals with disabilities. Given ASHA's organizational goals, Senator TOM HARKIN was a natural choice for the ASHA Distinguished Service Award. The Senator from Iowa is the chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Disability Policy. He is the author and chief sponsor of the Americans With Disabilities Act. He led the fight to establish the National Institute on Deafness and Other Communication Disorders. Senator HARKIN has drawn attention and funding to the development of assistive device technology for people with disabilities. Senator HARKIN's efforts in these areas and others reflect his legislative abilities, his political leadership, and his special sensitivity about the needs of individuals with disabilities.

Senator HARKIN is one of only seven Members of Congress who have received the Distinguished Service Award during the past 30 years. The late Congressman, Claude Pepper, received the Distinguished Service Award in 1982.

In presenting the ASHA Distinguished Service Award to Senator TOM HARKIN, ASHA's Dr. John W. Folkins of the University of Iowa stated:

It is a pleasure to present to you the American Speech-Language-Hearing Association's Distinguished Service Award.

Each year, the American Speech-Language-Hearing Association, on behalf of its 60,000 members, recognizes individuals and institutions that have made significant contributions in the area of communication disorders.

Since 1960, when the Distinguished Service Award program began, the award has been given to such organizations as the Deafness Research Foundation, the National Association of American Business Clubs, and the Sertoma Foundation; and to such individuals as Grey Panthers Founder Maggie Kuhn, and former Senator Lowell Weicker.

ASHA is proud to present the 1989 Distinguished Service Award to you in recognition of your outstanding efforts in increasing the public's understanding of communication disorders and because of your leadership on federal legislation benefitting people with communication disorders and other disabilities.

It is my pleasure to represent the Executive Board of ASHA which has formulated the following resolution to award our highest recognition:

"Whereas, Senator Tom Harkin serves as the Chairman of the Senate Committee on Labor and Human Resources Subcommittee on Disability Policy and has been influential in promoting the concerns of the disabled and the health professionals who serve them, and

"Whereas, Senator Harkin led successful efforts to establish the National Institute on Deafness and Other Communication Disorders and to provide assistive technology to persons with disabilities, and

"Whereas, Senator Harkin is leading efforts to assure full access to opportunity through the Americans with Disabilities Act, and

"Whereas, Senator Harkin has brought personal experience and sensitivity to his responsibilities, especially his familiarity with deafness; therefore

"Resolved, That the American Speech-Language-Hearing Association presents the Distinguished Service Award to Senator Tom Harkin."

Mr. President, I know all of my colleagues join me in congratulating Senator HARKIN for his service to people with communication disorders and this special recognition from the American Speech-Language-Hearing Association.

SENATOR BOREN'S SPEECH TO THE NATIONAL PRESS CLUB

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I rise today to call the attention of the Senate and the American people to the remarks recently made by our colleague Senator DAVID BOREN to the National Press Club.

Senator BOREN's wise leadership as chairman of the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence has given him a unique, valuable perspective from which to analyze the threats to our national security interests, which he ably did in his Press Club speech. Senator BOREN's conclusion, which I find very persuasive, is that—

The gravest threat to the future security of this country is our failure to adjust our thinking to all the changes in the world around us.

Mr. President, I'm sure we all recall the words of Czechoslovak President Havel before a joint session of Congress last February, when he noted that changes in Eastern Europe have been so rapid that "we literally have not time even to be astonished." Senator BOREN points out that we must overcome our future shock and adjust to an emerging new global setting. He then suggests a number of creative ways in which we might do this—in the Nation at large, in our foreign policy, in the intelligence community, and in the Congress.

I have been privileged to serve on the Intelligence Committee under Senator BOREN's leadership and to benefit from the experience and judgment he brings to this important post. These qualities are reflected in his speech to the National Press Club, which I commend enthusiastically to my colleagues and to the American people.

I ask unanimous consent that a copy of Senator BOREN's speech be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS BY SENATOR DAVID L. BOREN, NATIONAL PRESS CLUB, APRIL 3, 1990

There is no time to waste. We urgently need to put into perspective the changes that are going on in the world around us—what those changes mean for us and what they mean about the need to repair our political institutions.

I'm often asked, as Chairman of the Intelligence Committee, to name the greatest threat to our national security interests. I suppose that most people would expect me to talk about terrorism; to talk about military imbalances; to talk about the fact that there is still the possibility of a major attack by strategic nuclear weapons against the United States; to talk about the proliferation of nuclear and biological and chemical weapons; or those things because they all constitute a very real threat to the United States which cannot be ignored.

But if I were to focus on what I think is the greatest single challenge facing us today, I truly wouldn't name one of those. I would say that the gravest threat to the future security of this country is our failure to adjust our thinking to all the changes in the world around us.

Einstein, soon after the atomic bomb was detonated for the first time, was asked for a comment. He said, "Everything in the world has changed except our way of thinking." Our thinking had simply not been able to keep up with the pace of change in the world. All of us are struggling, whether we're on the policy side or on the journalism side, to sort through what all of the changes in the world around us mean—what they mean for the United States, what they mean for our future international role and what assets we will need to survive in this new world environment.

All of this came home to me just before Christmas when I had to grapple very quickly with the meaning of this change. In a weak moment during the Panama situation I had agreed to an interview on The CBS Evening News with Bob Schieffer, who was off in New York. They put me in a tiny little room in Washington with no windows, no ventilation and no one in the room with me—just the camera and a digital clock.

I was sitting there watching the digital clock, knowing we were about to go on the air. It was down to one minute and thirty seconds and, all of a sudden, a lady came bounding through the door and handed me a sheet of paper. She said, "Senator, this just came off the wire. You'd better read it right now. You might be asked about it on the air." So I started to read. It said that the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Hungary had just completed its meetings and they had voted to abolish the Communist Party, change its name to the Socialist Party, call for free elections, and allow a multi-party system.

As I got through reading the paper, I looked at the digital clock. It said that there were forty-seven seconds before air time. Then a voice came through my ear-piece from New York saying, "Senator, did you just read that wire copy?" And I said "Yes, I just glanced at it." The voice replied, "Good. When we go on the air, Mr. Schieffer is going to ask you about the historical significance of this development."

I remember thinking to myself that forty-seven seconds was probably a little longer than most of us in Washington take to reflect upon these changes in the world before pontificating about their importance.

But it demonstrates how fast the changes are coming, and how they are affecting us without our being able to sort through what they mean. We need to pause and consider what they mean to the United States and to our role in the world and we need to do it immediately. We need to come to an understanding of where we're headed.

In one way, we've had a strange and symbiotic relationship with the Soviet Union. It may sound like an odd thing to say, but I don't think that we fully understand the implications of the decline of the Soviet Union for ourselves: their decline could very well lead to the decline of the United States as well.

Why would I say that? Well, when you think about it, the European countries, Japan, and others have been willing to follow the lead of the United States over the past few decades. Why? Because they needed us. As long as there was an external Soviet threat, as long as there was a threat from the Warsaw Pact, as long as we were providing the shield of military protection for them—and paying for that shield—they needed the United States. So they were willing to follow our lead.

But what about now, in these changed circumstances? Are they going to need us as much as they once did? They're economically strong: the GNP of the European Community is larger than ours; the per capita income of Japan is higher than ours and last year they invested twice as much for every new job created as we did in the United States. Will they be as willing, in this new environment, to follow the lead of the United States as they were just a few short months ago? I don't think so. This feeling came home to me in a chilling way as I was listening to testimony in the Intelligence Committee two or three weeks ago when we were speaking with some of those who are responsible for our intelligence programs around the world.

As I was talking with them, one of them said, "You know, Senator, we have some real problems." And I said, "What do you mean? He said, "Well down at the operational level—not at the highest government levels, but down at the operational level—people are already looking at us and saying, 'Why are you still here?' People we've been involved with during joint operations in the past. 'Why are you still here? We don't need you anymore. When are you going home?'" So already—even at the operational level—there is a change of attitude, a change in the willingness to follow the United States.

What does this mean? It means that our influence in the next century is going to be determined by very, very different assets than it was in the twentieth century. It means that our influence is going to rest upon other factors—such as economic strength—in a way that it has not for the last three or four decades when it has rested primarily upon our military strength. Our influence is also going to rest upon our moral leadership: the model we present for other nations to follow in terms of our political system.

If that is the case, where do we stand? Where do we stand in terms of the economic strength of this country? We're in a very different position from where we stood in 1950, at the beginning of the Cold War. Then we had nine of the ten largest banks in the world; now we have none of the top twenty. Then we had a seventy percent share of world assets and world markets; now we are down to the eighteen and nineteen percent range. It follows that we have an urgent need to restore the economic strength of this country if we're going to play a leadership role in the next century—if we are to have as great an impact on the world as we did in this century.

If you doubt that the world is shifting from primarily military to primarily economic competition, look at the targets for foreign intelligence operations. It's very interesting that as the arms race is winding down, the spy race is heating up. Where is the growth area in espionage activity? It's against private commercial targets in the United States—carried out not by foreign companies, but by foreign governments. More and more the aim of espionage is to steal private commercial secrets for the sake of national economic purposes—rather than to steal military secrets for building military strengths in the spying countries.

So we have shifted, and we have to change our thinking to adjust to the changed circumstances in which we are living. But what should we do? Are we simply so far behind—is our economic strength eroded to such a degree—that we should just throw up our hands and say, "Well, I guess that's all we can do. I guess we just have to give up. I guess the United States, which has led the world, is going to become a bit player in the next century"? I don't think so. There are things we can do. There are opportunities that we have, opportunities for shifting resources, for building the kinds of assets and the kinds of strengths which will take us into a leadership position in the next century.

But it's a critical time. If we let this decade go by without understanding what we need to do to get ready for a new environment, we do so at our own peril.

What should we do? In the first place, we're going to have to make some solid decisions in the domestic realm to improve our ability to conduct foreign policy. We have to make sound economic decisions here at home. That means changes in tax policy, for example. How in the world do we think that we can write a tax policy for this country in a vacuum without considering how that policy affects our ability to compete in the world marketplace? Every governor of every state in this country understands that when you change the tax law in a state, you affect the ability of that state to grow and develop economically since you're in competition with other states. Why can't we understand that as a nation?

Why don't we understand that if we want to get our savings rate up, the investment rate up, and the cost of capital down to encourage exploitation of technologies to create new jobs and to maintain those jobs, we're going to have to look at what the competition is doing to encourage investment with their tax policy.

Why don't we realize that we urgently need to enter into negotiations about an environmental clean-up and about bearing the costs of that clean-up worldwide? We're debating the Clean Air Act right now. We realize that if we're going to make the improvements that we need to make, other countries are going to have to follow suit or the United States will be disadvantaged in world competition with higher costs of production. There has to be international negotiation and international environmental policy. The United States cannot do it alone any more than we can write our tax policy alone.

We have to think about how we shift a primarily military economy—or one where we view military expenditure as paramount—to a civilian-oriented economy. Who is thinking about that? Who's helping us to decide how to ease that transition? Are we going to help defense contractors apply the research and development investments they have made towards non-military fields through some kind of tax credit? Are we going to take those troops that will be coming home from Europe sooner or later and put them to work rebuilding the infrastructure of this country, the water systems, the transportation systems, the environmental infrastructure that is so badly in need of repair? We have to think about the domestic decisions that we need to make in light of conducting foreign policy and strengthening our world position in the future.

What about foreign policy itself? And intelligence policy? What kind of changes are we going to have to make in our approach as the world around us is changing if we're to continue to play a leading role? What should we do?

Most important, I think, is the need to reevaluate how this country gives foreign aid. We need to make a revolutionary change in the way that aid is given. We're approaching a time when the United States is being asked to do more and more. How in the world are we going to meet all of the requests that are before us and still maintain our traditional commitments to countries that we've helped in the past?

The developments in Eastern Europe, the developments in Panama will be debated on the floor of the Senate in the next few days. How do we persuade the American people to do more in terms of foreign aid when, according to the latest poll, opposition among the American public to foreign aid is at the highest it has ever been? Eighty percent of the American people strongly oppose an increase in foreign assistance. What are we going to do?

I think we have to shift. I think we have to move towards what I would call a "Buy America" program. Look at what's happened, for instance, to aid given to Poland and Hungary by West Germany and Japan. We gave $800 million. How did we give it? Mainly cash: about eighty percent of it had no strings attached. How did they give the $2.1 billion they gave? They gave it with strings attached. Ninety-four percent of it was credits that could only be used to buy goods produced in their own countries. Now we have to think about that. I believe if we are to continue to play a role we have to switch to a "Buy American" approach. Offer American goods when they're rebuilding their infrastructure, when they're building their transportation system, building new plants. It should be American equipment that goes into those plants, American equipment that goes into the transportation system, American equipment that goes into the telecommunication systems.

If we adopt such a program, then in the future, when those countries need spare parts, they will be American spare parts produced with American labor. They will be American service contracts when repairs need to be made. This is a way for us to play a role and for the taxpayers to see some return on their investment in terms of creating more jobs here at home. We have to realize that when we talk about burden-sharing with others—when we say to others, principally the West Germans and the Japanese, "Come in and help us bear a large share of the burden; we only want to be a small player in helping Eastern Europe or Central and Latin America," that burden-sharing is also influence sharing.

If we want to maintain a share of influence, if we want to take this opportunity while encouraging others to develop markets for our products in the future, then we have to be prepared to play a larger role. And I think the only way we're going to be able to play a larger role is to shift the way we give foreign aid to a "Buy American" approach to create jobs and income here in this country and to develop economic relationships abroad. So we need to shift to a "Buy American" approach.

Second, we also have to shift the way the foreign policy establishment of this country views its role—particularly those who are serving us in the foreign service overseas, both in diplomatic and intelligence fields. We must begin to regard our embassies not only as outposts for American political influence but we must begin to regard them as outposts for American economic influence as well.

It is extremely important that we begin to bring people into the foreign service who have abilities in the field of economics—who have degrees in business; who have experience in business; who understand the importance of using our embassies to develop economic opportunities and economic relationships for our country in the future. That's extremely important.

I see Ambassador Perkins here today, the Director-General of the Foreign Service. He's a visionary man; we're very fortunate to have him in his position at this time. He realizes we have to change the attitude of our embassies. We can no longer regard the commercial section as something that ought to be in the basement or preferably in an annex—something that really shouldn't be in the embassy at all. A commercial section must become part and parcel of the total operation and commercial skills are essential in our diplomatic missions around the world if we're going to spread American influence and keep that influence in the future.

Third, I think we need a massive increase in student exchange programs in the United States, and I'm working with Senator Pell and others to achieve this. It becomes a matter of exerting America's influence and leadership in the world. Why do I say that? Why do I believe that we should begin by adding at least 10,000 more exchange students at the undergraduate level going in both directions, between the United States and the Soviet Union, Eastern Europe and, in particular, Central America? First of all, it creates bonds between the future leaders of those parts of the world, bonds of friendship and understanding of our system and our values and ourselves.

We want to make the changes that are occurring in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union irreversible. The best way to do that is to bring the future leaders from those countries here to study. Expose them to American values, expose them to American institutions—it is so important. I'll never forget being in El Salvador a couple of years ago, where we're spending $800 million a year in military and economic aid, and having our ambassador call me aside. He said, "I need your help with something." I thought he was probably going to say, "Well, we need some more military aid. We need an additional package." He said, "Could you help me find forty student exchange slots to bring forty student leaders in El Salvador to the United States to study? The other side is taking 800 identifiable student leaders off to Cuba and elsewhere to study and is changing their outlook."

We need to bring them into the United States in order to have an opportunity to educate them here. But it's a two-way benefit. It isn't just the need to bring those leaders who, for example, will be playing a role in a united Germany and parts of Eastern Europe. It's also the need to get American students overseas. One of the greatest needs we have in this country, as we enter a new world environment, is to internationalize the thinking of the next generation of Americans.

How in the world are we going to go out and compete economically, how are we going to be politically involved if we don't speak the languages of the world, if we don't understand the cultures of the world? If you just look at the statistics about the number of exchange students coming into this country—and about seventy percent of them are from the Orient—and the number of American students who are venturing out—or not venturing out—to the rest of the world, it's really astounding.

Last year 356,000 students from other countries came to study in the United States. Now, in contrast, how many American students do you think went to other countries to learn other languages and be exposed to other cultures? While 356,000 students came here, only 24,000 American students ventured out into the rest of the world to live, to study, and to have that kind of learning experience in another culture. The number of Americans studying abroad is less than the 25,000 students who came from Maylasia alone, a country of 14 million people, to study in the United States.

Look at what's happening in our study of foreign languages. By the year 2000, the European Community has set as a goal that every single sixteen-year-old will be able to speak two languages in addition of their own. We are now struggling to get thirty percent of the college and high school students in this country to study at least one foreign language.

Last year, of the students that graduated from high school in Japan, one hundred percent of them were fluent in English. They had to take six years of English to graduate from high school in Japan. In contrast, two one-hundredths of one percent of American students had any exposure whatsoever to or study of the Japanese language.

How in the world are we going to be ready to go out into a new international environment and hold our own when the next generation of Americans doesn't seem to have an understanding that it's an international environment in which they're going to be living and competing? We must change.

We also have to change the emphasis that we're giving in the intelligence community in terms of services and the kinds of skills that we need. In this changing world what we need from the intelligence community is also changing. When we're looking at the foreign policy of the country, when we're looking at the intelligence policy of the country, one of the things we have to guard against is the tendency for bureaucracies to sanctify the present and ignore the future.

There's always a tendency to protect today's programs instead of reaching out to meet tomorrow's challenges. We're in exactly that situation today in the intelligence community.

Obviously, we're going to be far less concerned in the future about any kind of threat from the Warsaw Pact; about any possibility of a massive attack across the borders of Eastern Europe. That has all changed.

We're going to be in lower forward positions around the world in the future. We're not going to have bases in all the places we've been before. We're not going to have as many troops in forward positions.

What does this mean for intelligence? It means we're very unlikely to have another brush-fire situation or a regional conflict like Panama where we already have our troops on the scene, ready to move in; where we already have a lot of intelligence; where we already know about the various personalities and players, the economic situation and other factors.

It means that we're going to have to have intelligence, good human intelligence, to tell us about the intentions of leaders in advance so that we can begin to move forces early on in any crisis. We're going to have to shift our intelligence so that it will be readily usable by tactical commanders who have to move troops from long distances into situations all the way around the world, where we don't have bases like we have in Panama or the Philippines or other places. It's going to take a whole new kind of intelligence.

We're going to have to know about foreign governments' intentions for oil production levels, exchange rates and trade policies. We're going to have to protect our own commercial enterprises against the theft of commercial secrets. We're going to have to think about the role that we want our own intelligence service to play in terms of protecting America's economic and commercial interests around the world. We have to ask how far it should go, what is appropriate for our government intelligence agencies to do to look after our commercial and economic interests in a free enterprise system, in a democracy.

When we think about terrorism, when we think about laundering of drug money, when we think about nuclear proliferation—again we must think of improving human intelligence. The training and the beefing up of our human intelligence capability become all-important in terms of finding out what is going on around the world.

We have to think the unthinkable. We have to think about the fact that our intelligence job is going to change if we have to deal with a Soviet Union that is primarily democratic instead of a Soviet Union that is a closed society as it has been in the past.

We need different intelligence skills, focuses not so much finding out what went on at the Politburo meeting between a narrow range of decision makers, but what is going on with the people—finding out how these influences will come to change a system which is becoming increasingly democratic.

Thus, there are many things that we have to think about in terms of changing the intelligence capabilities of our country. I think you can see from what I'm saying that we're going to have to put great emphasis on the improvement of our human intelligence capability because intentions, changes of policy, and changes of public attitude are going to be far more important to us than they have been, particularly in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union.

It is a new world; we have to stop and think about our role in it; we have to have a vision for it. It's been said that those who mill around at the crossroads of history do so at their own peril. We are there—there's no doubt about it. If we don't understand that, we're going to place our nation at risk. If we don't understand that we're going to have to have a whole new set of assets to lead the world in the twenty-first century than we had in the twentieth century, we place our nation's role at risk.

If we're going to do that, if we're going to have that kind of focus, if we're going to come up with plans, if we're going to have the vision, our own domestic political institutions must work well. I think we realize that our political institutions here at home have severe problems. Reforms need to be made. Look at the fact that in these newly emerging democracies—Nicaragua, for example—over ninety percent of the people went to the polls in the recent elections. When you look at East Germany, over ninety-five percent of the eligible voters went out to vote in the last election.

Then look at the United States, where we struggle to get up to the fifty percent level in presidential elections, and we're down to the twenty and thirty and forty percent level, if we're lucky, in Congressional elections. There is a cynicism growing among American citizens about politics that is driving them away from the voting place. We have to do something about it.

When Congress should be grappling with the changes in the world, approaching them with vision, coming up with a blueprint to share with the American people, and asking the American people to be a part of that blueprint, more and more of congressional time is spent in reelection efforts and raising the funds necessary to run a political campaign.

Even the daily schedule of Congress is driven not by policy issues, not by these changes in the world, not by clean air issues or aid to Panama and Nicaragua—the schedule is driven by the need for political fundraising. No votes on Mondays, particularly on Monday nights. Those are political fundraising nights, as everyone in Washington knows. No votes pass on Friday because members have to go all around the country—to California, Florida, New York—to raise the necessary funds. The time and attention that should be spent on solving the nation's problems are going into raising the money necessary to run for reelection.

If you just look at the figures, it's easy to see the kind of problems that we have. Since 1976, the cost of winning a United States Senate race has gone up 570 percent. From $600,000 in that year to an average $4 million in the last election cycle. That means that the average Senator has to raise $15,000 in campaign contributions every single week for six years to find the amount of money necessary to defend his or her seat in the coming election.

Where is that money coming from? Is it coming from the grass-roots? Is it coming from the people back home, from the home state or district of that Congressman? Absolutely not. Again, in the last twelve years, contributions from political action committees, mainly headquartered here in Washington, have gone from $22 million to $147 million. In the last election, well over half of the members reelected to Congress received far more than fifty percent of all their campaign contributions not from the people back home, but from the people here in Washington, D.C. who control political action committee money.

I was once interviewed at a meeting of PAC managers, and they asked a very serious question of me. One of them said, "Senator, don't you think that's a good development? One congressman told me, 'You know, I feel good about it, because now I can just raise all my money up here in Washington in three or four nights, and I don't have to go back and inconvenience those people at home, my friends, and embarrass myself by having to ask them for contributions to my campaign.' "

My answer to that was, "Thank God the Constitution requires it, or we could just conduct the election here in Washington too and not inconvenience the people to participate in the political process in any way whatsoever."

What has the infusion of all this money done to the system? What has it done in terms of allowing young people to come into the political process, with fresh ideas and new concepts about how to solve our nation's problems? We all know that not only is more money being spent and more of that money coming from special interests, more and more of the money is going to incumbents. In the last election cycle, the political action committee gave to incumbents at a rate of four-to-one in the Senate and the rate of eight-to-one in the House. On average, incumbent members of Congress were able to outspend their challengers by a ratio of two-to-one.

What are we going to do about it? We have a real opportunity and a pressing need to deal with these problems in our own political institutions as we look out at a world that is changing, look out at a world that calls for us to face it with new vision and new understanding. I think we have a real opportunity this year. There's been a seachange in attitude. Part of it has to do with the number of ethics cases that are now pending in Congress. Part of it has to do with increased public awareness. Almost eighty percent of the American people, according to recent polls, now say they support overall spending limits in political campaigns. The people want something done.

We were very close to passing a bill two years ago, as you know, and I think we could take S. 137, the bill that I've introduced with Senator Byrd and Senator Mitchell, and probably pass it through the Senate as it is now. We had fifty-five votes for our bill last time. We were only five short of cloture. With all of the changes that have taken place, I'm convinced that we have already picked up the five votes that are necessary.

But we don't want to push through a bill—I do not want to do it, Senator Mitchell doesn't want to do it—that is principally sponsored by only one political party. We want a bipartisan approach. This is a problem for all Americans. We don't seek any political advantage. We don't want to write a bill that tips the scales in favor of the Democratic Party or the Republican Party. We want to solve the problem.

That's why we're working very hard towards a consensus. Right now I'm working with a number of Republican senators; Senator Stevens, the ranking Republican on the Rules Committee, has been very active in this effort to work out a bipartisan compromise so that when we take this issue to the floor a week or two after the Easter recess, we'll be able to have a strong bipartisan vote and a bipartisan consensus.

I think we can do it around several principles. One, overall spending limits that have to be voluntary under the Supreme Court decision. An overall limit that candidates can receive from PACs in the aggregate, and an overall limit on the amount that candidates can spend in the aggregate. There would only be one exception to the aggregate spending limit. I was suggested by a special committee of experts which was appointed to give us new ideas and try and break the deadlock about spending limits. They came up with an idea that they call flexible spending limits. Since Republicans have always been traditionally opposed to any kind of complete and total limit on spending, these experts suggested to us that we make an exception. They suggested we have an overall limit, but it would not apply to small in-state contributions raised from individuals. That's the kind of participation in the political process that we want to encourage.

I believe that a combination including an overall spending limit, overall limits on amounts coming from PACs, along with the so-called flexible limits exception of allowing unlimited amounts to come from small in-state contributors gives us a way to break the partisan stalemate on this issue.

We also, of course, are going to have to deal with the problem of bundling. We're going to have to deal with the problem of reforming the Federal Election Commission so that it can break the present three to three deadlock and actually make some decisions. And we have to come up with a package of incentives which will make it attractive enough for people to accept the voluntary spending incentives.

I think we've included such incentives in the proposal we're putting together. We have, for example, said that those who accept the voluntary spending limits will get lower mailing rates and a lower broadcast rate. Senator Danforth has come forward with a very fine suggestion that we're going to include that would allow a very, very low cost broadcast rate, almost free time, for two and five minute segments for those candidates that accept spending limits, to allow for real debate and not just negative thirty second spots.

We've also come up with a disclaimer so that those who refuse to accept the spending limits will have to put on all of their ads, including those on television. "This candidate does not accept spending limits," for the whole time it is on the air. We think that's something which will be a strong inducement to candidates to accept limits given the change of public attitude.

We're almost there. We have a real chance to do something meaningful for our country through real campaign reform.

We have a real chance to make people believe in the political system again, to make them keen to participate in elections, since the elections will once again be decided on issues and the qualifications of candidates, and not on who can raise the most money.

So here we are. I think we all realize, perhaps in a way people have not realized it before, that we're playing out a role in history. With all the changes that are around us, we have to change our thinking, as Einstein said. It is absolutely vital for us to adjust our thinking, to realize that we are at the crossroads of history, that we cannot afford to mill around. We have to seize these opportunities, because they may not come again. In order to seize them, in order to prepare this country to lead in the twenty-first century, we need to get our own house in order. We intend to do it. This is the year when Congress must face up to that responsibility.

Thank you for letting me come and visit with you today.

THE CONTINUING AIDS CRISIS

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, on April 27 I introduced S. 2536, the Medicaid AIDS and HIV Amendments of 1990. Four Senators joined me in that effort—Senators ADAMS, KENNEDY, DODD, and INOUYE—which, in part, would provide Medicaid outpatients services—primarily prescription AIDS drugs such as AZT and aerosolized pentamidine—to those who have the human immunodeficiency virus [HIV] but who have yet to become symptomatic with the various opportunistic disease which define the acquired immune deficiency syndrome or AIDS.

Of added significance, our proposed legislation—first introduced in the House of Representatives by a pioneer in such matters, Congressman HENRY WAXMAN—would provide an enhanced Medicaid payment to hospitals which serve a disproportionate number of AIDS patients. I outlined in my statement the impact both the AIDS and crack epidemics are having on our health care institutitions whch are primarily our hospitals. Five percent of our Nation's hospitals serve over 50 percent with AIDS more and more of whom are or will become Medicaid dependent. But only when hospitalized. Currently, we do not provide Medicaid reimbursement for preventive health care services which would delay if not prevent hospitalization.

In my view, the prognosis for this disease will not soon improve. We will develop better treatments but how, when, and where we will provide them will continue to present an enormous challenge, one with both ethical as well as economic ramifications. This epidemic will not soon disappear. It will not remain in the coastal urban areas of this country where it has already so tragically impacted our gay and minority communities. Indeed, the disease will continue to appear throughout the country. The numbers may not be as dramatic, but they will persist. We will and we must respond to this epidemic. How we choose to do so will be defined by the numbers of people who will or will not die from it.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an editorial from the May 5, 1990, issue of the Washington Post entitled "AIDS: An Expanding Emergency" be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, May 5, 1990]

AIDS: AN EXPANDING EMERGENCY

Each year the sobering figures move inexorably higher. As of March 31, it is estimated that about a million Americans are infected with the virus that causes AIDS. More than 128,000 cases of full-blown AIDS have been reported, and more than 78,000 people have died. By the end of this year, public health experts expect that another 50,000 cases will be diagnosed. By next year, AIDS will be the leading cause of death for Americans between 25 and 44.

The toll on individuals is, of course, indescribable. But there is a public health impact, too, and it must be addressed, or the nation's hospitals—particularly the large, urban, public facilities—will collapse under the weight of this burden. The problem is concentrated: 13 metropolitan areas—Washington is one—have 55 percent of all reported AIDS cases, and 5 percent of the nation's hospitals care for half of all AIDS patients. Fortunately, emergency legislation is now moving through Congress to deal with this crisis. In the Senate, a bill with 65 cosponsors has been reported unanimously by the Labor and Human Resources Committee, and in the House, another proposal has been reported unanimously by the Health subcommittee of the Committee on Energy and Commerce. Both bills would authorize federal grants of $300 million a year to help cities with severe AIDS problems. The Senate measure would include hospital care, and the House bill would limit assistance to outpatient services and hospices. Both bills also provide money—the Senate $300 million, and the House $500 million—for services including counseling and testing, early intervention help and drugs. Only the House provision is means tested.

On another track, Rep. Henry Waxman and Sen. Daniel P. Moynihan have introduced bills to broaden the Medicaid program to include HIV-infected poor people before they become disabled and to provide new subsidies to hospitals that bear a disproportionate share of caring for AIDS Medicaid patients. When the epidemic was in its early stages, about half of all patients were covered by private insurance. Now, as the number of patients who are drug abusers and generally uninsured increases, the demands on Medicaid have doubled. Funding must be increased and eligibility standards adjusted to account for these developments.

The principles that underlie these bills are clear: help those suffering from this devastating disease who have neither resources nor insurance. Provide early intervention that can delay the onset of the disease. Promote the development of alternatives to expensive hospital care when clinics, home health services and hospices are preferable. And save the big city hospitals that can no longer cope with the crisis unaided.

LETTER FROM PRESIDENT CHAMORRO

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I want to take a moment to share with the Senate a letter I received yesterday from President Violeta Chamorro of Nicaragua.

As we all know, President Chamorro was inaugurated on April 24 as Nicaragua's first democratically elected national leader. I noted in a floor statement on that date the enormous challenges she faces, trying to put her country back together again—after years of war and Sandinista mismanagement.

I ask to have the full text of President Chamorro's statement included in the RECORD—and I want to briefly summarize it.

The message is "short but not so sweet." Unless the United States provides substantial aid to Nicaragua very soon—she says, within 2 weeks—there will be an increasing possibility of what she terms "serious instability."

She specifically asks for help in two areas: Jump-starting Nicaragua's agricultural economy, as the planting season reaches full swing; and helping with the reintegration of the democratic resistance forces—the so-called Contras—tens of thousands of whom are coming back into Nicaragua, looking for homes and jobs.

In my view, President Chamorro is not crying wolf. Nicaragua's needs are urgent. The pressure of the problems she cites, and the continuing alertness of many Sandinista diehards to find chances to sow public discontent and unrest, means her new government must deliver—and deliver fast.

It is not only our responsibility to help—it is very much in our interest. We can make no greater contribution in our own security in this hemisphere than by helping her government succeed.

The mechanism to help is obvious to us all. We have passed an emergency supplemental, responding to Nicaragua's needs. The House has passed its own version of the bill. The provisions on Nicaragua are practically identical.

I hope the conference will move swiftly on this critical bill; will deal effectively with the controversial provisions which would slow its final passage; and will give us a product we can approve as soon as possible—and hopefully within the 2-week timeframe laid out by President Chamorro.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MAY 5, 1990.

Hon. Senator ROBERT DOLE,
Minority Leader, the Senate, U.S. Congress, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR DOLE: The people and the Government of Nicaragua face serious economic social and political problems inherited from the past. Our people have taken the first fundamental step, through a democratic election, to solve these problems and find solutions through peaceful means, within a context of reconciliation and economic recovery.

As we take decisive steps to bring about the demilitarization of our country in order to simultaneously tackle the economic and social problems, we face the reality of a government nearly bankrupt. This fact jeopardizes the progress that has been made, and threatens the opportunities that have opened to the Nicaraguan people to consolidate democracy and peace.

The disastrous policies of the outgoing government have left a legacy of hyperinflation, but we have not shied away from making difficult economic decisions. We hope to have this cancerous inflation under control by the end of the summer. Until then, we need immediate help. The Legislative package you have before you granting aid to Nicaragua, will provide that assistance. Unless we can use some of that aid in the next two weeks, we run the prospect of serious instability problems driven by our lack of funds to pay for critical imports.

There are certain areas that are particularly urgent. Our agricultural cycle for staple crops and cotton, which are vital to our economy, begins with planting at the end of May. In order to increase the planting areas of these crops—corns, beans, sorghum, and especially cotton—we urgently need your aid. My Government's ability to increase agricultural production this year, creating jobs, food and exports, thus bringing some measure of stability to my country after so many years of war and dictatorship, depends in great measure on your timely help.

I must mention one other area where your help is vital. As you know the forces of the Nicaraguan Resistance have returned to Nicaragua to initiate the process of demobilization. The OAS is responsible for feeding them, but their funds for this purpose are virtually exhausted. If the peace and demilitarization process is not to be jeopardized, new funding, as provided by the referred legislation is needed.

In sum, the legislation before you is crucial not only for economic recovery but for peace. It is because these problems are so serious, that I have taken the opportunity to write to you directly and ask for your help and assistance in the timely passage of this important legislation.

Sincerely,

VIOLETA B. DE CHAMORRO.

HOSTAGES

Mr. REID. Mr. President, we are all happy to see Frank Reed and Robert Polhill home in America. But we should not express gratitude to Iran for their role in this situation. Perhaps they helped get Reed and Polhill released, but let us not forget that they were also responsible for their capture, detention, and ill-treatment.

Mr. Polhill was released after 39 months of captivity, Mr. Reed was released after 43 months, Colonel Higgins was brutally murdered and six Americans are still being held. Yet, President Rafsanjani pronounced the United States a "stubborn and spoiled child" for not thanking his country.

On demanding an exchange of prisoners, the Iranian President is missing a vital point: American captives are innocent victims whereas the prisoners being held by Israel are criminals. What were the crimes committed by Reed, Polhill, and Higgins? Their only crime is having been Americans. What are the crimes of Sheik Abdul Karim Obeid, who is being held by the Israelis? His crimes include murder, abduction, and torture.

For this Rafanjani wants gratitude?

Mr. President, we cannot forget that hostages remain and that their detention is a barbaric and illegal act. And we cannot rest assured that this type of activity will cease. I ask unanimous consent that an article written by Mike O'Callaghan, from the Las Vegas Sun, dated May 3, be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. REID. Former Governor O'Callaghan asks the questions:

Are we to celebrate the recent return of Reed and Polhill and forget about Terry Anderson who has been a hostage since 1985? When all is said and done, are we just going to forget about the brutal murder of William Higgins?

Mr. President, I suggest that the answer should be a resounding "No."

EXHIBIT 1

WHERE I STAND

(By Mike O'Callaghan)

War is hell, and so is being held a hostage in Lebanon by Islamic militants! But why were almost the first words out of released hostage Frank Reed's mouth critical of his own country? Reed, on Syrian television, almost immediately criticized the U.S. for not acting fast enough for his release.

Was Reed on some special U.S. mission like the late USMC Lt. Col. William Higgins was with the United Nations when Islamic terrorists seized and later killed him? No, Reed was living very comfortably in Muslim West Beirut where he, a Muslim convert, lived with his Syrian wife and young son.

Despite all of the previous kidnappings of Americans and violence, Reed continued to run a private school. He was on the way to a country club to play golf that September morning in 1986 when he was abducted. He has lived a life of hell since that day and all of us are happy to see him released to rejoin his wife and child.

Reed, to me, is just one more of many private citizens who ignored warnings about the dangers of being taken hostage by Muslim extremists. Most of them were captured after Terry Anderson, a working Associated Press correspondent still being held, was taken hostage.

So much for two hostages being released with still six more Americans being held. Some loud voices now cry for President Bush to give official recognition to the kidnappers along with Iran and Syria, the countries that have great influence with them. Best these people back off and let Bush continue to demonstrate his skills in international relations. He hasn't done too bad after being in office little more than a year.

Don't expect Israel to release a large number of Arab prisoners until all Israelis have found their way home and out of the hands of terrorists. Israel has traded hostages in the past and will continue to do so. One time they released almost a thousand Arabs for but a handful of Israeli soldiers.

In the meantime, Israel will continue to hold Hezbollah Sheikh Abdul Karim Obeld who was a ranking terrorist in his own right. The Hezbollah (Party of God) is the outfit that took Terry Anderson hostage three years before Obeld was taken by Israel.

Are we to celebrate the recent return of Reed and Polhill and forget about Terry Anderson who has been a hostage since 1985? When all is said and done, are we just going to forget about the brutal murder of William Higgins? Who's going to pay for this heinous crime? Unless something is done to the killers, there's no notice going out that other American citizens working and playing over the world had better be treated with greater respect.

President Bush is right, we are nowhere near a point of light where we can let down our guard against terrorists and happily celebrate. There are more to be released and some debts we owe for the brutal slaughter of several U.S. citizens including Marine Lt. Col. William Higgins.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill.

Pending:

(1) Roth amendment No. 1585, to modify the definition of a partisan political office.

(2) Dole amendment No. 1586, to provide limitations on the political activities of certain employees of the intelligence and law enforcement agencies.

(3) Simpson amendment No. 1587, to delay the effective date of the Act until bans on PAC contributions and soft money are enacted.

(4) Dole amendment No. 1588, to provide for penalties for employees violating certain prohibitions on political activities.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order the time between now and 12 noon is divided equally and controlled by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. GLENN] and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. ROTH].

Who seeks recognition?

Mr. ROTH addressed the Chair.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Delaware [Mr. ROTH].

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, I yield myself 3 minutes.

AMENDMENT NO. 1585

Mr. President, the first amendment on which we will be voting this morning is a very simple, straightforward amendment. It would strike from the bill the ability of Federal employees to hold any office or position within a political party or affiliated organization. If this amendment is approved, it would retain the same law as applies today to this specific issue.

In his veto message in 1976, President Ford stated that if Hatch Act legislation became law, "pressure could be brought to bear on Federal employees in extremely subtle ways beyond the reach of any anticoercion statute so that they would inevitably feel compelled to engage in partisan political activity." In my opinion, this would be the inevitable result of this legislation. Proponents of this legislation do not seem to appreciate the expectations, the pressures, and the coercion that will spring forth if this legislation is enacted.

Few of us would find it appropriate for employees of the Federal Election Commission to be president or treasurer of the Democratic or Republican National Committee at night and serve as umpires over partisan politics by day. This legislation would allow just that. My amendment would prevent it.

Few of us would find it appropriate for an employee of the Internal Revenue Service to be president of the State Democrat or Republican party organization at night and conducting an audit of a local business by day. This legislation would allow that. My amendment would prevent it.

Few of us would find it appropriate for an assistant U.S. attorney to be chairman of the local Democratic or Republican Party organization at night and prosecuting political corruption during the day. This legislation would allow just that. My amendment would prevent it.

These, Mr. President, are but a few examples of what we could expect if this legislation is enacted. And what kind of confidence would that inspire in the American people to see these Government officials attempting to administer in a nonpartisan fashion the affairs of Government by day and the running of partisan politics at night?

In a letter to the Governmental Affairs Committee during the 100th Congress, and I believe is as accurate today as when it was written, the American Bar Association stated:

> We question the existence of such a clear line. The timing of an employee's permissible activity may be clearly defined, but the employee's possible motivation for such activity is not. Will it be any less an evil in the future than it has been in the past for an employee on his or her own time to actively work for the election of a partisan candidate out of a sense of loyalty to his or her superior or out of pressure from that superior, real or perceived? * * * Participating in partisan political activity as a result of pressure from one's bosses at work is a "freedom" which Federal employees can well live without. The bright line of "on-duty" and "off-duty" of S. 135 is a mirage.

Mr. President, I would like to draw an analogy: Suppose that we were at a baseball game and there were 60,000 fans supporting and cheering loudly for the home team. All of a sudden, all of the umpires join in the cheers. Would they be considered impartial? Now proponents of S. 135 would argue, well the umpires would not be able to cheer on the job. Well, suppose the umpires did not cheer on the job, but afterward, off the job, they openly displayed their partisan support for the home team. Even if they called every ball and strike and every out perfectly the next game, every baseball fan would begin to doubt their impartiality.

Just like the umpires in this example, Federal employees who become actively involved in partisan politics, whether it is holding office in the national, State, or local Republican or Democratic Party organization or campaigning for a particular candidate in a partisan election, would become identified with a partisan cause. This will fundamentally alter the public's impression of a nonpartisan civil service.

Mr. President, my amendment would keep the current prohibition on Federal employees from holding office in political organizations. It is a straightforward amendment and I urge its support.

I yield the remainder of my time.

Mr. GLENN addressed the Chair.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. GLENN] is recognized.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I yield myself such time as I may use.

Mr. President, the basic problem with the Hatch Act through the years has been that it is so murky, it is so unclear, that people do not know what they can d- on the job or off the job.

It is not that some things are permitted in the Hatch Act and not permitted in other places. It is that all these different interpretations have grown up through the years, so the people are not even sure what they can do on the job or off the job.

The basic purpose of S. 135, which I think we have done, is it clarifies this; it says specifically, you cannot do anything politically on the job. We even take away the right to wear buttons, which we have talked about a lot here over the past several days. We cannot do anything on the job.

But off the job, we say you can do some things. But still off the job, there are certain things that you cannot do, absolutely cannot. One of those things off the job, you cannot run for elective public office yourself. You are prohibited from raising money from the public. The only fundraising you can do is what is permitted right now with regard to raising money for a PAC from within that known organization; but you cannot go out and solicit funds from the public.

Outside of that, should people be permitted to run for or hold office within a political organization on their own time, at night or whenever, weekends, whether it is a local Democratic work club, or whether it is being a precinct committeeman, or whatever.

I see nothing wrong with that. Every American has a right to have a political interest, and every American should have those political interests cutback only where absolutely necessary. That is what this does. This is not a repeal of the Hatch Act. That comes up every day. It is not a repeal of the Hatch Act. What it does is it revises the Hatch Act only to the extent that I just outlined.

In other words, it makes clear what has been a very, very uncertain area, where there are literally thousands of interpretations, so that people do not really know what they can do and what they cannot do. All S. 135 does is clarify it. It makes it workable. It makes it workable so people will know off the job specifically what they can do, and they cannot exceed certain limits. It makes sure what they can do on the job, which is nothing, politically. So it takes away all this uncertainty that the Federal employees have been saddled with for so many years.

Mr. President, at the appropriate time, I will move to table. I believe we are going to have these votes, it is my understanding, stacked, and vote on them one right after the other; is that correct?

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is correct. The votes will begin at 12 noon.

Mr. GLENN. At the appropriate time, I will move to table this amendment and the others to follow. We will discuss the following amendments.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Who yields time?

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum, and I ask unanimous consent that the time be equally divided from both sides of the aisle.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Without objection, it is so ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 1587

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, let me briefly summarize the crux of the matter on which we will be voting with regard to the Simpson amendment. I want to respond, too, to my friend, Senator BOREN, who spoke this morning, and say very clearly, I am not proposing to deal with PAC's one special interest at a time, in response to his remarks. I am proposing not to change the laws governing Federal employee union PAC's.

My amendment pursues the exact goal of doing all PAC reform simultaneously. That is what I am up to. S. 135 would enact the change in the law governing Federal union PAC's, not my measure. I wanted to clarify that.

Yesterday, my good friend from Ohio and I conducted, I thought, a very good dialog of debate on the merits of the case.

I think it was a discussion which I think swept away a lot of side issues and irrelevancies and did a great deal to clarify a few points in disagreement.

I commend him for that, and I enjoyed that opportunity, and I take him at his word when he says there is no intention on his part to enact a sweeping repeal of the Hatch Act. Those are his words. He is talking about the reformation provision and that type of activity.

We both agree that the Hatch Act is legal. It is quite constitutional. It is so. We agree that our IRS auditors should not do their business while wearing campaign buttons, either Bush or Dukakis buttons, or whatever you wish, and there is a lot of common ground here, and Senator GLENN is doing a great job of piecing it together.

Here is the fundamental point of contention to deal with in this bill. It is the fact that this bill would expand the numbers of those who are permitted to solicit—that is the word—solicit contributions to Federal employee union political action committees. It is right there on page 4 of the bill. The bans on soliciting, it says, do not apply when the target is "a member of the same Federal employee organization and the solicitation is for a contribution to the multicandidate political committee." That is a PAC.

That is the new definition of Federal employee organizations. I do not know what that means. You want to get honest. Let us use the word "union." It is at least less painful for those of us who are going to legitimize the process where 92 percent of the money that comes into the kitties are going to elect Democrats. That is a little twisted view of fairness.

So there is a change in the law being proposed here, let us admit that, because we say it is, and we say it is substantial. It is an expansion of the number of PAC contribution solicitors, limited only now by the size of the Federal work force, and that is 2.9 million people. That is what you got here; there is no limit given to the number of folks who will suddenly become designees. What a marvelous phrase for a surrogate, for a union boss as a designee of the the union leadership, who can now go forward, the day after work, of course, probably on the Sunday before election would be an awfully good time to turn lose 600,000 postal employees who could take their own sacks with them. It is a day off, and you have every right then to go your route. I cannot imagine anything more grotesque for people who are hired on to do the public business and not be involved in partisan politics like we are. So there is no limit to the impact this could have on this year's Federal employee union PAC revenues.

We are opening it all up with that change, because I promise you that newly permitted political activities are going to become the unspoken prerequisites to career success in those jobs.

My colleagues who disagree with me about that will, I hope, still be concerned abut the absolute inconsistency of giving these PAC's a big boost now, just in time for the election while giving lip service to the ideal of their legislative death somewhere down the road, like next week, as we deal with campaign reform. How are you going to sell that one? We will take one step backward now, before November, and promise to take two steps forward in 4 years? That is the way to let off all the people running this year. I do not think that is going to fly at all.

Why do we not wait until the dust settles on the action we ultimately take on PAC's and soft money before we enact these so-called Hatch Act reforms? How can we justify allowing Federal employee PAC's to grow by our actions this week and possibly eliminating them the next? I note, parenthetically, that under the Democratic campaign reform plan, such PAC's would still exist and could still contribute large sums to the traditional beneficiary of 90 percent of their largesse, which is the Democratic Party. I conclude, Mr. President, and ask my colleagues to think about that and pass this amendment which would add to this bill the limited virtue of resolving these related issues all at the same time. Thank you.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Who yields time?

The Chair recognizes the Senator from Ohio [Mr. GLENN].

Mr. GLENN. I yield myself 2 minutes.

Mr. President, when the Hatch Act was passed, there were no such things as PAC's. They are not even addressed in the Hatch Act. I agree thoroughly with the Senator from Wyoming that we need campaign reform. I think we also need to make the Hatch Act something workable. That is exactly what this bill does. It says all vagaries that have come out through the years with all the different things under the Hatch Act will now be clarified, because now, for once and for all, you will be able to know exactly what you can do on the job, which is nothing, and off the job what you can do, which is limited, but you still cannot make solicitation for political contributions to the general public nor can you run for elective office. That is all it does.

Mr. President, I do not want to see us tie these two things together. I think it is unwarranted. That is the reason I opposed the proposal by the distinguished Senator from Wyoming. There is no reason to wait. The Hatch Act needs reform even if there is never a campaign reform bill, which I think there is going to be, and I understand it is going to be brought up shortly. Whether or not there is a campaign reform bill, we need the changes made by S. 135 to the Hatch Act. That is the reason I oppose this particular legislation.

I know we are going to start voting in about 4 minutes here. I do not know if the Senator from Wyoming wishes to address the third amendment, if it is going to be brought up or not. We only have about 4 minutes. I ask the Chair how much time is remaining on both sides.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has 4 minutes, 18 seconds remaining. The Senator from Delaware used all the time allocated under the previous order.

Mr. GLENN. All right. I am willing, if he wants to talk about it, to yield the Senator 1 minute.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I do not control the time. I appreciate the courtesy of the Senator from Ohio. I have no further remarks on the amendment.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio retains the floor.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, the third one is the one that Senator DOLE is going to bring up. I believe that he submitted it yesterday and it involves putting additional restrictions on to Government employees of FEC, IRS, CIA, and Department of Justice. Laws restricting those people and what they can do are already on the books. I see no need to repeat them here. I read into the RECORD yesterday all the different things in the United States Code right now involving what they can do and cannot do and that they cannot use their official positions or information gained on the job, such as IRS, CIA, FBI, Department of Justice, they cannot use information gained on the job to go out and use it politically. If they do, they are in trouble under other parts of the United States Code, and should be. This bill does not open up any avenues for them whatsoever. It does not take away any restriction from other legislation at all.

Mr. President, I am prepared to yield back all time and go to the vote and start the vote. I believe the first vote is 15 minutes with two 10-minute votes to follow; is that correct?

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is correct.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, as a cosponsor of S. 135, I feel strongly that reform of the Hatch Act is long overdue. I have worked hard since my arrival in the Senate to restore political rights of Federal workers.

In 1976, as a freshman Senator and a member of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee, I supported legislation that would have provided broader Hatch Act reforms than those in the bill we are presently debating. Unfortunately, President Ford successfully vetoed that bill.

Opponents of Hatch Act reform have been able to prevent Congress from taking up this important issue until now. Under the leadership of Senator GLENN, the Senate is finally once again ready to approve legislation to ease the restrictions on political activities of Federal workers.

Mr. President, when the Hatch Act was originally passed in 1939, political patronage was the rule rather than the exception for employment in the civil service. The bill prohibited Federal employees from taking an active role in partisan political activities in order to ensure the civil service remained nonpartisan.

The civil service, however, has changed dramatically since the passage of the original bill. The patronage system no longer exists. The majority of Federal jobs are now filled by the objective merit system. We can afford to remove the restrictions on political rights of Federal workers without jeopardizing the quality and effectiveness of our civil service.

The Supreme Court reviewed the constitutionality of the Hatch Act in 1947 and again in 1973. In both cases, the Court upheld the law but recognized that the rights of Federal workers were infringed. In the latter case, the court commented that Congress could "strike a better balance than it has."

Hatch Act reform does precisely that. Under this legislation, Federal workers will no longer be discouraged from expressing their political beliefs. Hundreds of thousands of civil service workers will be able to do more than just vote at the polls.

This legislation also decreases the already unlikely opportunity for coercion under the current merit system. Restrictions for on-time political activities are tightened and procedures for punishing those who violate the Hatch Act are strengthened.

Mr. President, there is no reason why Federal workers should be deprived of their rights. They deserve similar political rights as their counterparts in the private sector. I support the passage of S. 135 and urge the President not to veto this legislation.

AMENDMENT NO. 1585

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, what is the first vote?

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first vote, under the previous order, will occur on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Delaware, amendment No. 1585.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I move to table the amendment.

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. All time has expired. Under the previous order, the question occurs on the amendment of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. ROTH] amendment No. 1585. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. GLENN] to table the amendment of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. ROTH]. AMENDMENT NO. 1586

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KERRY). Under the previous order, the question is on agreeing to amendment No. 1586 proposed by the Senator from Kansas.

Who seeks recognition?

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I have cleared this with the majority leader. We would like to ask unanimous consent for 2 minutes on a side to touch on this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the amendment prohibits employees of the Central Intelligence Agency, the Internal Revenue Service, the Federal Election Commission, and the Justice Department from giving a political contribution to another employee, a Member of Congress, or an officer of a uniformed service. It also prohibits such employees from requesting or receiving political contributions from any of these persons.

In addition, this amendment prohibits such employees from taking an active part in political management or in political campaigns.

The basic effect of this amendment is to exclude employees who work for these particular agencies—the IRS, CIA, FEC, and Justice Department—from the relaxed standards on partisan political activity set forth in S. 135—and to impose standards which are the same as such employees are currently required to abide by.

In short, Mr. President, this amendment would have the effect of maintaining current Hatch Act law with respect to these special Federal workers.

ACCESS TO CONFIDENTIAL INFORMATION

It is not a secret limited to those inside the beltway that personnel of these agencies have access to—and deal on a regular basis with—very sensitive information. IRS, CIA, Justice Department, and even FEC employees have access to all kinds of information that is extremely personal—such as financial records and criminal investigations—information that is not intended for public dissemination and that would be extremely harmful and embarrassing—to say the least—if wrongfully released.

The distinguished Senator from Ohio has said that these employees are prohibited by law from disclosing such information and denies that there is anything to worry about. I say there is plenty to worry about.

To allow such individuals to actively engage in partisan political activities is to expose them to the temptation to use whatever means are at their disposal to advance their political candidate or their political cause—temptations that are strong and emotional and that would not exist but for S. 135.

For more than 50 years, such employees have been shielded from such irresistible temptations. I do not understand why we are seeking to change a policy that has historically worked and continues to work so well.

If S. 135 becomes law and this amendment is not part of that law, there will inevitably be leaks and scandals and this Senate will probably find itself looking at legislation to fix the many problems that the passage of this bill would unleash. This amendment fixes at least some of those problems.

AGENCY CHIEFS OPPOSE S. 135

Mr. President, I also want to remind all of my colleagues of the letters from the Attorney General, the Commissioner of the IRS, and the Chairman of the FEC which I introduced into the RECORD yesterday. Each of these individuals clearly and unequivocally stated his or her opposition to S. 135.

Not only is there concern over the impact that politics will have on the fair and impartial implementation of Federal programs and Federal laws, but as Attorney General Thornburgh, Commissioner Goldberg, and Chairman Elliott indicate, the very fact that their employees will be able to actively engage in political activities will undermine public confidence in the agency's ability to do its job.

In short, S. 135 hurts these agencies by compromising the American public's perception of the impartially of those who are responsible for administering their day-to-day affairs.

If S. 135 becomes law, whenever the IRS announces a controversial tax ruling or the Justice Department initiates a controversial investigation, such decisions would be able to be attacked as partisan. This is not good for the agencies or for the American people. It is simply not good law.

SAME AMENDMENT APPROVED IN 1976

Finally, Mr. President, I want to remind my colleagues that this is the same amendment that was cosponsored by Senator BENTSEN and which passed the Senate by a vote of 68 to 23 back in 1976 when the Senate was considering Hatch Act reform legislation.

If a strong majority of Senators—a majority that included Senators BIDEN, BUMPERS, BYRD, DOMENICI, HATFIELD, HOLLINGS, JOHNSTON, NUNN, PACKWOOD, PELL, ROTH, and STEVENS—thought this was a good amendment in 1976, I do not understand why it is not a good amendment today. The distinguished Senator from Ohio says that the bill we were considering in 1976 was a different bill but this is irrelevant.

The amendment approved in 1976 basically kept IRS, CIA, and Justice Department employees subject to the original standards set forth in the Hatch Act—the same as my amendment.

The fact that the bill we were considering in 1976 and S. 135 have different standards with respect to political partisan activity for other workers has nothing to do with the fact that the amendment which passed in 1976 and the amendment we are considering today both limit the activity of IRS, CIA, and Justice Department personnel in exactly the same way.

The only difference is that my current amendment includes personnel of the Federal Election Commission which was not around in 1976. Indeed, if the FEC did exist, it would have been included in that amendment and I am sure that the vote would have been exactly the same.

CONCLUSION

In conclusion, Mr. President, I ask that my colleagues carefully review my amendment and they will see that there is nothing tricky or unusual in it. All it does is keep certain very special groups of Federal employees subject to the same rules they are required to follow today.

The policy reasons for this are obvious and compelling.

Even the distinguished Senator from Ohio has acknowledged that perhaps certain groups should be isolated for special rules when it comes to partisan political activity.

Senator GLENN indicated that this could be effected by regulations issued by the agencies themselves. He refers to the Congressional Research Service study which was introduced into the RECORD. I say this is not the right approach.

As the CRS study said, case authority clearly states that there needs to be a statutory basis for the promulgation of such regulations and in my opinion, S. 135 provides no such basis.

The only way to ensure that these employees will not engage in such partisan political activities is to write it into the law. This is what I urge my colleagues to do when they vote on my amendment.

In summary, Mr. President, in 1976, in legislation dealing with reform of the Hatch Act, I offered an amendment to except the Justice Department, the CIA, and the IRS. That amendment carried by a large majority. It was cosponsored by the Senator from Texas, Mr. BENTSEN, and those who voted for it included Senators BIDEN, BUMPERS, BYRD, DOMENICI, HATFIELD, HOLLINGS, JOHNSTON, NUNN, PACKWOOD, PELL, ROTH, and STEVENS.

The only difference in this amendment today is that I added the FEC. They are the ones who look over our shoulders all the time. I do not think we want to politicize the FEC.

I know my colleague will say that was a different time and a different piece of legislation. But the amendment is identical except for the addition of the FEC.

Do you want the CIA and the FBI and the IRS and the FEC to be politicized? I do not think so. That amendment passed—I do not have the vote here now—68 to 23 in 1976. I do not believe anything has changed. I think it is a good amendment. I think it would help this legislation, and I rest my case.

Mr LEVIN. Mr. President, I am voting to table the amendment offered by the minority leader, Senator DOLE.

I cast this vote not because I disagree with the basic premise of the amendment offered by my distinguished colleague. I agree that it is appropriate and necessary that agencies possess the authority to set separate standards for those employees of the Federal Government who operate in sensitive areas and are privy to sensitive information. However, those agencies currently have the authority to use their own discretion to restrict political activity by regulation. In fact, its also my understanding that the Federal Election Committee and the Department of Justice currently impose tougher restrictions on certain sensitive employees than those imposed by the current Hatch Act law.

S. 135 does nothing to change that authority of the agencies and, therefore, would continue the ability of these agencies to set appropriate and effective standards for individuals employed in sensitive areas.

Therefore, it would be redundant at best and confusing at worst to pass the amendment offered by Senator DOLE. Under S. 135 the authority currently provided to agencies with regard to sensitive employees would remain in place and I encourage agencies to responsibly use this authority to ensure that sensitive Government activities and, as a result, the American public is protected.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, in 1976 I voted in favor of a Dole amendment to a Hatch Act reform bill which would have excluded employees of the Justice Department, Central Intelligence Agency, and the Internal Revenue Service from reforms of the Hatch Act. I believed it was unwise to permit employees of agencies with access to confidential information on individual Americans to engage freely in partisan political activity including the solicitation of campaign contributions from individuals. Today, however, I am voting against the similar Dole amendment to S. 135 which now also excludes Federal Election Commission employees. The tighter, more restrictive reforms in S. 135 than in the 1976 bill, in combination with laws on the books to prohibit Federal employees from misusing the influence of their offices, reassure me that the Dole amendment is not required on the pending legislation.

The 1976 bill would have allowed Federal employees to solicit campaign contributions from other individuals. S. 135, prohibits Federal employees from soliciting or accepting a political contribution from anyone other than another member of the employee's union.

Currently, all Federal employees are prohibited from: First, soliciting or accepting a political contribution from anyone other than a member of the same Federal employee organization; second, using official influence or authority for political purposes; and third, disclosing confidential Government information. (18 U.S.C. 201, 203, 205, 207, 208, 209; 18 U.S.C. 594, 595, 600, 601, 606; and 18 U.S.C. 1905, 2071; 5 U.S.C. 552a.)

Internal Revenue Service employees are subject to criminal penalties if they: First, receive anything of value for the compromise, adjustment, or settlement of a charge; and second, disclosing tax return information. (26 U.S.C. 7214; and 26 U.S.C. 6103.)

In addition, the Commissioner and employees of the Federal Election Commission are prohibited from publicly supporting a candidate subject to the jurisdiction of the FEC. (5 U.S.C. 7324 et seq.)

Therefore, I am voting against the Dole amendment because I believe current law and the differences in this bill versus the 1976 bill are sufficient to assure me that my previous concerns have been addressed.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I yield myself such time as I might use.

The minority leader's remarks included a reference to a similar amendment passed in 1976. He did not mention, however, that his amendment was to a bill that would have allowed Federal employees to solicit money from the general public. That is illegal under S. 135.

It would also have allowed Federal employees to run for partisan political office, which is also illegal under S. 135. A similar amendment to that of the minority leader involving intelligence agency employees was considered by the Governmental Affairs Committee during its markup. The amendment was defeated in committee because the bill does not allow any Federal employee to raise money from the public in any event or to hold partisan political office.

So except for these activities there is little reason to restrict intelligence agency employees or IRS employees, any other Federal employees from other kinds of political activities—misconduct on their part, using information from their agencies is already covered under other legislation.

To sum it up, the Dole amendment should be defeated because it addresses a problem that does not exist. It is applicable to a 15-year-old bill that is different in very major respects from S. 135.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, let me repeat, the amendment is the same. You can still solicit if you do not have this exception. IRS employee union members can solicit other members of the same employee union. You can still be active politically, heading political organizations. I do not really believe it belongs in this bill. I hope that we would not table—I guess the Senator is going to move to table—the amendment. I think it would be making a big mistake.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I move to table the amendment.

HATCH ACT REFORM AMENDMENTS OF 1989

The Senate continued with the consideration of the bill.

AMENDMENT NO. 1588

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Kansas, the minority leader, had an amendment that I was prepared to accept with a small change which had been made. I want to compliment him on doing what he is doing because he toughens up on violations of people who have been determined by the Merit Systems Protection Board to have violated on two occasions any provision of the law of this title. If people have violated it twice, then they will be removed from employment, and that is that.

That particular person would not be able to hold any position as an employee of the Government. Elected position would be all right if the people so decide. That is fine. My only concern with this was that the Merit Systems Protection Board normally has recourse to the courts.

If you are convicted under MSPB, or you are called for a violation, you would have a right to appeal that into the Federal court system and have it before a judge and jury. We wanted to make certain that protection for employees was still in this.

The distinguished minority leader, the author of the amendment, suggested that we just add a little sentence to it: "Such removal shall not be effective until all available appeals are final."

That is excellent. I think it is a good addition to this effort. We will be happy to accept it.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I want to thank the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. GLENN] for his cooperation and his staff working with staff on our side to make the necessary change. I do believe it is an amendment that should be adopted.

My view of this bill is I may not support it, but if it is going to happen, I want to make sure it is in the condition that it should be: To protect certain groups, and also make certain someone in this case who violates the law and through all the appeals is still found guilty of a violation twice, then that person no longer serve in the Government. This amendment will make that provision. I am pleased it will be accepted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The modification has not yet reached the desk.

AMENDMENT NO. 1588, AS MODIFIED

Mr. DOLE. I send the modification to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has a right to modify his amendment. The amendment is so modified.

The amendment, as modified, is as follows:

On page 6, insert between lines 3 and 4 the following new section:

"§ 7326. Penalties

"Any employee who has been determined by the Merit Systems Protection Board to have violated on two occasions any provision of section 7323 or 7324 of this title, shall upon such second determination by the Merit Systems Protection Board be removed from such employee's position, in which event that employee may not thereafter hold any position (other than an elected position) as an employee (as defined in section 7322(1) of this title). Such removal shall not be effective until all available appeals are final.".

On page 6, insert between lines 11 and 12, immediately after the matter preceding line 12, the following:

"7326. Penalties."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (No. 1588), as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GLENN. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. DIXON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, if the distinguished manager has a moment before he moves to the next amendment, I ask unanimous consent to speak briefly on another subject unrelated to the bill as in morning business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Without objection, it is so ordered.

CONTINUING TURF WAR: SEC AND CFTC

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I hope the majority leader, who I see leaving the floor, could hear this just for one moment because it is a matter of interest to the administration, I think, and the distinguished Republican leader is one who has always been willing to express his own point of view. I think many times that is beneficial to the administration, and they have learned a great many things from the Republican leader, who I consider to be one of the well-informed Members of the Congress on this and other subjects.

I hold in my hand, Mr. President, a story which will now appear in news media around the country, and I would like to read from it a little to inform my colleagues about this continuing argument about a turf war between New York and Chicago and the question of whether the SEC ought to gobble up the CFTC or whether there should be some major bureaucracy over the SEC and the CFTC.

I quote directly from the story:

The shadow financial regulatory committee has advised against a merger of the Securities and Exchange Commission with the Commodity Futures Trading Commission.

A single regulator would tend to stifle innovation in financial markets combining the two agencies wouldn't address—

Would not address, I underscore any of the problems cited by critics of the existing regime, the group said.

The shadow committee, composed of academics and industry participants—

In other words, Mr. President, the people who know, not the people in Government, the people who know.

academics and industry participants, meets periodically to discuss topics pending before financial regulatory agencies and publishes its conclusions in the form of position papers.

Commenting on a piece of legislation pending on Capitol Hill that would merge the SEC and the CFTC into a single agency to be called the Markets and Trading Commission, the committee said it couldn't identify—

I want to stress, it couldn't identify—any serious problems that would be remedied by such an arrangement.

"The current regulatory framework has fostered a competitive and innovative financial system," the panel said, adding that while some regulatory inefficiencies may exist in the prevailing setup, they are a small price to pay for the innovative markets that have developed.

In general, the shadow committee cochaired by George Kaufman, a Loyola University of Chicago professor, and Lawrence Connel, a lawyer with Prather, Seeger, Doolittle, and Farmer, said it believes that markets governed by a monolith regulatory structure display less innovation and "competitive creativity" than do those which are not so regulated.

I also said that given the SEC's past record, it appears highly unlikely that many successful markets in financial futures would have been born.

This is a committee outside the Government, Mr. President, may I say to my distinguished friend, the Republican leader, who has shown an incisive attitude about this in the past.

Again, it also said:

SEC Chairman Richard Breeden has recently been attempting to make exactly the opposite case, arguing that split jurisdiction between stocks and their derivative products is impeding innovation.

"We think that in fact is the reverse of reality," said committee member Franklin Edwards, a Columbia University professor.

Mr. President, I am so pleased that my dear friend, the distinguished Republican leader, is kind enough to have stayed and listened. I just want to say to this administration again, it is listening to people within the administration who want to get involved in a turf war between the city of New York and the city of Chicago and two different markets. Every single sensible, intelligent analysis of the situation by everybody in the industry, all the scholars, all the academicians who have looked at it, says that we have become innovative, we have become competitive, we have become the strongest market in the world because we are doing it right. Why do we want to fix something that is not broke?

Everytime I go to town meetings back home, people get telephone bills out of their pocket and say, "How come they fixed the telephone system; it always worked better before. Everytime we have something that works good, we go try to fix it."

Mr. President, we have the best markets in the world. The Japanese copy from us, and even after copying they are not as good in this kind of a marketplace. Everybody wants to change it. Why do they want to change it?

Mr. President, I only want to conclude by saying here is a study. I expect the administration will see this study. I hope that my friends in Treasury and the SEC and other places who are advocating this ill-conceived idea will read this study as well. It is a profoundly bad idea.

Mr. DOLE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIXON. I thank the Senator. I do yield, may I say to my friend from Kansas.

Mr. DOLE. I agree with the article just referred to, and certainly I think a merger would be a total mistake. It would stifle competition. I do believe that this is not going to happen.

Now, there are some other options that the administration has talked about. I have been in contact with the Treasury Secretary; I feel strong about this. I told him I want to be helpful, but I did not think I saw anything so far that looked as if it might be of interest. There may be some areas we can compromise to make certain that some of the fears that the Secretary of the Treasury has will not arise.

I have discussed that with the Senator from Illinois and Members who have an interest from Chicago. But I certainly share the view that as far as the merger is concerned, that is not going to happen. In my view, there would not be support; there would be bipartisan opposition, and I would be pleased to join the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I only want to say in response that the Senator from Kansas, the distinguished Republican leader, knows of my personal affection and my high regard for him and my view of his outstanding service to his State and this Nation.

I thank him for that response, and say again, in conclusion, that I think this is perhaps the worst, most ill-conceived idea I have ever heard around this place, and I hope that some who continue to return to it on every occasion before every forum would abandon the idea, get the country moving forward again, and turn their attention to other matters of greater import.

I thank the Chair and yield the floor.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, parliamentary inquiry. Is it necessary to ask unanimous consent to speak as if in morning business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes, the Senator will have to ask unanimous consent.

Mr. GORE. I ask unanimous consent to speak as if in morning business for 7 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

STRATEGIC WEAPONS DECISIONS

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I rise in order to draw the attention of my colleagues to a brandnew report just prepared by the Congressional Research Service. It is entitled "Ballistic Missile Forces Under START, Critical Issues for Congress in FY 1991." It answers a request that I put to the Library of Congress for an analysis of how the prospective START agreement impinges upon decisions about strategic weapons—decisions that we will soon face in Congress.

The report also contains a short but extremely interesting section which looks ahead at aspects of a follow-on agreement to START, or START II, in terms of its possible impact on decisions which will soon occupy us.

Although Soviet strategic forces are outside the scope of CRS's report, let me begin there. We have been told already that the Soviet Union appears to be shaping its strategic forces around the limitations it anticipates will be part of a START agreement. This means that their decisions about specific weapons are part of a complete concept for Soviet strategic forces.

If the Soviets are really proceeding in this manner, their approach stands in sharp contrast to our own. Neither the administration nor the Congress has begun to make plans for our strategic forces that reflect the numerical limits of a START agreement. And yet if we get such a treaty and if we do not take START into account, then choices we shall be making over the next year can commit us to costly and avoidable steps in the future. We can also discover that myopic planning can impair negotiating approaches the United States may wish to pursue for strategic arms agreements beyond START I.

We need to pay attention to the arithmetic of START. Under START, the United States will have a limit of 4,900 ballistic missile warheads and it will probably have 7 years in which to reach that total. However, even if the United States gets rid of all its warheads on older submarine-launched ballistic missiles and all of the Minuteman II's we will have difficulty accommodating the 4,900 limit to our modernization plans.

Under these plans and taking into account retirements, the Air Force could end up with a force comprising at least 2,000 ballistic missile warheads. At the same time, the Navy is planning a submarine launch force of over 4,000 warheads. Clearly, something has to give.

Moreover, the onset of this problem is not very far in the future. We will be committed to a forced tradeoff between land-based and sea-based systems as of the moment the United States deploys its 15th Trident submarine. The money for that submarine was appropriated several years ago. It is expected to enter the force in about 5 years.

In fact, as you will recall, Mr. President, the Navy wants to be able to have 12 Trident boats accountable under START. Ten are already in service. Congress has authorized full funding for the construction of the next seven, and the fiscal year 1991 budget request includes funds for the 18th boat and long lead funds for the 19th and 20th. We can, of course, worry about the implications of START for our weapons programs after a START agreement is in force. But if we do this, there is a risk that we will have to do some very drastic things. For example, if we deploy 21 START-accountable Trident submarines, the Congressional Research Service points out that the mathematics of a START agreement require that our ICBM force be cut from today's level of 2,450 to less than 900 warheads.

Under these circumstances, the United States would be heavily dependent on its future force of SLBM's to carry out all kinds of missions for ballistic missiles. We would be putting all of our eggs in one basket. And there is reason for some discomfort with that idea. Based on factors such as the need to assume certain improvements in the performance of SLBM forces, the need to assume that future SLBM forces never experience any serious systemic failures, and the need to assume that our submarine forces cannot indefinitely be as survivable at sea as they are today, with all of the advances in science and technology, it would be foolhardy to assume that submarine survivability will continue indefinitely just as it exists today.

In light of these concerns, it would be theoretically possible to design a force posture that favors ICBM's rather than sea-based missiles. CRS presents a case for such an option, but I think it is there mainly for the sake of completeness. We are much more likely to look for practical guidance to a third model option presented by CRS, which would continue roughly the present ratio of land- and sea-based ballistic missile warheads. Under this option, the United States would end up with 1,400 ICBM warheads and no more than 18 START-accountable submarines.

Some will regard this approach as attractive because it allows the United States to spread mission requirements across a broader base of weapons. As I mentioned earlier, however, funds for the 18th Trident submarine may well be approved by the Congress during the coming year. After that, with each successive Trident that Congress approves, the less accessible CRS' third option becomes and the more firmly we will commit the strategic forces of the United States to a fundamental realignment of missions.

There are ways to offset that problem. For example, we are seeking to negotiate an agreement with the Soviets whereby the weapons attributable to the two or three ballistic missile submarines that will be in drydock at any time will not count against START totals. Even if we agree with this, however, we need to take note that Congress is entering a zone of decision on strategic forces within which START totals matter a great deal.

Meanwhile, it is fair to say that talks on a second START negotiation have already begun. The indications are that if we actually get into such a negotiation in earnest, which I expect we will later this year, both sides might be interested not only in further reductions but in deMIRVing some portion of their ballistic missile forces. Indeed, Soviet spokesmen have already said on numerous occasions that will be their objective. The Scowcroft Commission years ago pointed the United States in that direction as well.

In any event, if that happens, there are already some things we need to be thinking about in connection with pending decisions on strategic weapons. For example, even if we only have another 1,000 ballistic missile warheads from START levels, there could be serious problems ahead for us, depending upon what weapons Congress funds in the near future.

Suppose, for the sake of argument, we opt now for a force of 21 START-accountable Trident submarines. Then a very modest follow-on reduction agreement would force us to destroy at least 3 Trident submarines in order to make the new total. This assumes that we also wind up with an ICBM force of just 500 warheads concentrated on only 50 MX missiles, period.

These numbers give us a disquieting, but useful and timely, warning. The decisions Congress is shortly going to make must not only fit intelligently into a START agreement, but must potentially accommodate a range of possible options for a START II agreement, a follow-on agreement. Not every force posture that fits well into START will fit well into START II. Any option that works well only in START but that clearly does not offer flexibility for the longer term should be filtered out now to avoid wasting money and effort. Any option that works well both in START and which also offers us flexibility in a subsequent negotiation, START II negotiation, is one that ought to interest us a great deal right now.

In this connection, I draw one very important conclusion from my reading of CRS' analysis of the potential follow-on agreement, tentative as that analysis is. The conclusion I draw is that the United States will need the flexibility and survivability of single-warhead, mobile ICBM's as the means to organize a balanced nuclear deterrent in a successor agreement to START.

From this I conclude that any decision that Congress makes which eliminates this option now not only weakens the forces we will have after a START agreement, but casts a long and spreading shadow over our ability to pursue strategic arms control beyond START.

At any rate, Mr. President, let me conclude by urging my colleagues to turn their attention to this CRS report. Unlike so many other documents, it is not an analysis of where we went wrong; it is a warning about mistakes we may yet make and an opportunity to avoid making those mistakes.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the CRS Report be printed in the RECORD. It is not very long. I commend it to the attention of my colleagues.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[CRS Report for Congress, May 3, 1990]

BALLISTIC MISSILE FORCES UNDER START: CRITICAL ISSUES FOR CONGRESS IN FY 1991

(By Amy F. Woolf, Steven A. Hildreth, Jonathan Medalia, Paul Zinsmeister, Foreign Affairs and National Defense Division)

SUMMARY

The United States and Soviet Union will probably complete a START agreement before the end of 1990. According to the framework currently under negotiation, this agreement will limit the United States and Soviet Union to 4,900 warheads on ballistic missiles. The United States currently deploys over 8,000 warheads on its intercontinental ballistic missiles (ICBMs) and sea-launched ballistic missiles (SLBMs). If the Air Force and Navy proceed with their planned strategic modernization programs, the United States will exceed the 4,900 limit throughout the 1990s, even if it dismantles its oldest ballistic missile systems. Consequently, the United States will apparently have to alter its planned modernization programs so that it can reduce the number of warheads on its ballistic missiles.

This report identifies three hypothetical ballistic missile forces that the United States might deploy under a START agreement and reviews how the strategic modernization programs might change to accommodate these forces. The Findings, on pages 2 and 3 of this report, summarize these forces. These three forces presume that the United States would deploy all 4,900 ballistic missile warheads permitted by START. It also presumes that the military distinctions between ICBMs and SLBMs would narrow as mobile ICBMs acquire the survivability usually associated with SLBMs and Trident submarines and D-5 missiles acquire the accuracy and responsiveness usually associated with ICBMs. Consequently, the report assumes that each force could provide the United States with a credible deterrent, even though they include widely different mixes of ICBM and SLBM warheads.

In the first force, the United States would emphasize SLBMs and sharply reduce the number of warheads carried on its ICBMs. The Navy would be able to proceed with its planned Trident modernization program. With 4,032 warheads deployed on survivable SLBMs, the United States might not need to deploy mobile ICBMs to improve the survivability of land-based forces. In the second force, the United States would emphasize ICBMs and sharply reduce the number of warheads carried on Trident submarines. To match the number of survivable warheads deployed in the first force, the Air Force would have to deploy both planned mobile ICBMs. With fewer than 3,000 SLBM warheads, the Navy would have to reduce either the planned number of Trident submarines in the fleet or the number of warheads carried on each submarine. In the third force, the United States would maintain a balance of ICBM and SLBM warheads similar to the balance in the force today. This force would include a greater number of survivable SLBM warheads than the second force, so the Air Force might only need to deploy one type of mobile ICBM to match the number of survivable warheads in the first force. Nonetheless, with fewer SLBM warheads than the first force, the Navy would have to alter its plans for the Trident program, although not as severely as in the second force.

(This report was originally prepared at the request of the Honorable Albert Gore, Jr. and is released for general congressional use with the permission of the Senator.)

INTRODUCTION

President Bush and President Gorbachev have both endorsed an early signing of a Strategic Arms Reduction Treaty (START). It seems likely that the countries will complete the agreement before the end of 1990. According to provisions currently under negotiation, the countries will have seven years to bring their forces into compliance with the treaty once it is ratified.

The START limit on ballistic missile warheads is likely to be of chief concern to the Bush administration and Congress. The countries have agreed that each side can deploy up to 4,900 warheads on submarine-launched ballistic missiles (SLBMs) and land-based intercontinental ballistic missiles (ICBMs). At this point, however, it appears that Navy and Air Force plans for their respective ballistic missile forces are not mutually compatible with this limit. Consequently, if the current START limits are adopted, the United States will have to decide about how to apportion its ballistic missile warheads between SLBMs and ICBMs.

Congress need not plan for U.S. forces under START or alter strategic programs during FY1991. However, it will have more choices, and a greater influence over the composition of U.S. strategic forces at the end of the 1990s, if it considers possible changes in strategic programs during the coming year. Because research, development, and procurement funds are invested in programs several years before weapons are actually deployed, Congress may find that the resource commitments it makes early in the 1990s will sharply constrain the deployment choices available by the middle of the decade. In addition, Congress might find it difficult to influence changes in force structure after new weapons are deployed.

This report begins with a brief description of the planned strategic modernization program and shows the need for changes in U.S. ballistic missile forces under a prospective START agreement. The report then describes three illustrative ballistic missile force structures that include at least 4,000 warheads deployed on survivable systems: one that emphasizes sea-based systems and sharply reduces ICBMs, one that emphasizes ICBMs and sharply reduces the number of warheads on Trident submarines, and one that maintains a balance of ICBM and SLBM warheads that is roughly equal to the balance existing today. In each case the report identifies changes in the modernization programs that would lead to the described mix of ICBM and SLBM warheads and reviews the advantages and disadvantages of these changes.

FINDINGS

1. If the START ceiling of 4,900 ballistic missile warheads is adopted, the United States must alter its plans for strategic forces during the 1990s because, under current programs, the number of warheads on U.S. ballistic missiles will exceed that limit.

2. The United States can dismantle older missile systems, such as Poseidon submarines and single-warhead Minuteman II missiles, to reduce warheads on its ballistic missiles. However, these changes alone would not bring the ballistic missile force into compliance with START. Additional reductions in either ICBMs, SLBMs, or both will be needed. The needed reductions may require changes in the planned ballistic missile modernization programs.

3. If, as Defense Department officials have indicated, the distinctions between the military capabilities of ICBMs and SLBMs are narrowing, as mobile ICBMs take on the survivability characteristics of SLBMs and SLBMs achieve the accuracy and prompt response characteristics of ICBMs, the United States could maintain a credible deterrent with a number of different ballistic missile forces. Figure 1 summarizes the ballistic missile force alternatives examined in this report.

4. The United States could deploy a ballistic missile force that emphasizes SLBMs and sharply reduces the number of existing warheads on ICBMs. (This is Force 1 on Figure 1.) This force would not require any changes in the modernization plans for SLBMs; the United States could continue to deploy one Trident submarine each year through the turn of the century. With 4,032 warheads deployed on survivable sea-based systems, the United States might decide it did not need the added survivability of mobile ICBMs. As a result, this force could lead to major changes in the modernization plans for U.S. ICBMs.

[Charts are not reproducible in the RECORD.]

5. The United States could deploy a ballistic missile force that emphasizes ICBMs and requires sharp reductions in the planned number of warheads on SLBMs (Force 2). To match the number of survivable warheads provided by Force 1, the United States would have to deploy mobile ICBMs. The United States might then sharply reduce the planned number of Trident submarines indicated under Alternative 1. Alternatively, to enhance the survivability and flexibility of the Trident fleet, it could build more Tridents by exempting the launchers on three additional submarines from the START limits (a U.S. START proposal) and/or by reducing the number of warheads on each submarine, as indicated by Alternatives 2 through 4.

6. The United States could deploy a ballistic missile force that maintains a balance of ICBM and SLBM warheads roughly equal to the balance existing today (Force 3). This would require reductions in the number of warheads on ICBMs and SLBMs, although not as severe as indicated for Force 1 or Force 2. Again, to match the number of survivable warheads provided for in Force 1, the United States would have to deploy mobile ICBMs. Even so, it may not need to deploy two types of mobile ICBMs. The alternative force structures for the Trident program would be similar to those in Force 2.

This report examines these ballistic missile forces in more detail. It examines the affects that each might have on the capabilities and costs of U.S. strategic systems.[1]

CHOOSING A BALLISTIC MISSILE FORCE STRUCTURE

The Ballistic Missile Modernization Programs

In the FY 1991 budget, the Bush administration has requested more than $6 billion for continued modernization of the U.S. ballistic missile force. The administration has not outlined publicly how the United States would apportion these forces between sea-based systems—ballistic missile submarines (SSBNs) and SLBMs—and land-based systems (ICBMs) under the limits in a prospective START agreement.[2] The Air Force and the Navy seem to be proceeding independently with their modernization programs, without regard for START. If these programs continue through the 1990s, the U.S. ballistic missile forces could eventually consist of:

For the Navy: Up to 24 Ohio class (Trident) ballistic missile submarines, with each carrying 24 8-warhead Trident II (D-5) SLBMs. The Navy has deployed nine Tridents, taken delivery of one other, and begun construction of seven more. It eventually plans to request funding for up to 24 Tridents. The FY1991 budget requests about $3.2 billion for the Trident submarine procurement (including the procurement of the 18th ship and long lead funds for the 19th and 20th) and the Trident II missile (including procurement of 52 missiles).

For the Air Force: 50 10-warhead MX missiles deployed on trains. (These missiles are currently deployed in silos.) The FY 1991 budget requests $2.8 billion to begin the procurement of trains for this system and to fund continued MX production.

Up to 500 single-warhead small ICBMs (Midgetman) deployed on road-mobile launchers. During testimony in support of the FY1990 budget, Secretary of Defense Richard Cheney said that the small ICBM force would contain 300–500 missiles. In the FY1991 budget, the administration requested $202 million for the continued development of this system.

Some number of older Minuteman missiles deployed in silos (there are currently 450 single-warhead Minuteman II missiles and 500 three-warhead Minuteman III missiles).[3]

Figure 2 displays how the number of warheads carried on this ballistic missile force would change through the year 2000. It illustrates the direction that the modernization programs would take if they proceeded according to the plans outlined by the Department of Defense, not adjusting these forces to comply with the limits in a prospective START agreement. New weapons enter and old weapons leave the force in accordance with the assumptions and schedules described in Appendix A.

Figure 2 illustrates the margin by which planned warheads on U.S. ballistic missiles would exceed the likely 4,900 limit in START throughout the 1990s.[4] The decline in warheads evident on the graph reflects the retirement of the Poseidon ballistic missile submarines. The Navy plans to remove all of these from its fleet by the end of the decade. The subsequent increase in warheads is caused by the addition of Trident submarines with their 24 8-warhead Trident II missiles at the rate of one per year.

The START Limit on Ballistic Missile Warheads

Figure 3 demonstrates that the United States could not comply with the START limit of 4,900 ballistic missile warheads by dismantling only the oldest ballistic missile systems that are slated for retirement during the 1990s. The graph excludes all the warheads on Poseidon submarines, because these would be retired graudally during the 1990s. In addition, the graph excludes all the warheads on Minuteman II missiles, because Secretary of Defense Cheney has stated that the United States would eliminate these missiles under START. The remaining warheads include those from the Navy's planned Trident submarines and those on an ICBM force of 50 MX missiles and either 500 Minuteman III missiles or a combination of Minuteman III missiles and Small ICBMs, for a total of 2,000 ICBM warheads. START will probably permit both countries to reduce their forces over a period of 7 years, and the report assumes the countries would begin to implement the treaty in 1991, so the United States would have to be in compliance with these limits by 1998. This is the year in which the United States would deploy the 20th Trident submarine. However, the figure shows that the United States would exceed the 4,900 limit, if it retained 2,000 ICBM warheas, when it deploys the 15th Trident submarine.

Figure 3 graphically illustrates that the Defense Department and Congress will have to decide how the ballistic missile force should be brought into compliance with the START limit on ballistic missile warheads. The problem is more than one of simply reducing warhead numbers. Indeed, the critical issue is one of force configuration, how the United States will apportion the ballistic missile force between the Navy and the Air Force. The choices range from a force that would hold the Navy to 15 Trident submarines (with 24 8-warhead missiles on each) and permit the Air Force to deploy

[1] Footnotes at end of article.

2,000 ICBM warheads, to a force that would require the Air Force to reduce its ICBM warheads by almost 70 percent so the Navy could deploy 21 Trident submarines that would count under START. One could construct other forces between these two.

Choosing Among Ballistic Missile Force Structures

The mix of ballistic missiles that the United States deploys under a START agreement will reflect judgments about the force structure that the United States needs to maintain deterrence. The essence of U.S. strategic doctrine is to deter a Soviet attack by maintaining "a diverse mix of survivable and capable strategic nuclear offensive forces that hold at risk those assets most valued by Soviet leaders and provide a range of options in response to attack." [5] This requirement has provided the rationale for the maintenance of a strategic triad. The different basing modes for bombers, land-based ballistic missiles, and sea-launched ballistic missiles has contributed to force survivability by complicating Soviet efforts to launch a coordinated attack against U.S. strategic systems. The Soviet Union presumably would not be able to launch a strike that would simultaneously destroy ICBMs and bombers, and it would not be able to destroy U.S. submarines at sea.[6]

In addition, Defense Department officials have stated that, to be seen as a credible deterrent, U.S. strategic forces must combine survivability with the accuracy, yield, and flexibility needed to deliver an effective retaliatory response.[7] This requirement has also supported the strategic triad because, until recently, each of the legs possessed unique capabilities that were needed in a retaliatory force. For example, ICBMs combined the accuracy and yield needed to attack all of the hardest Soviet targets with the high alert rates, responsiveness, and flexibility needed to ensure a prompt and effective response. But their survability has been in doubt for some time. In contrast, SLBMs have lacked accuracy and, some believe, responsiveness, but they possessed the survivability and endurance needed to ensure that the United States would be able to retaliate against large numbers of Soviet targets.

Secretary of Defense Cheney has said that, if the United States continues with its planned strategic modernization program, both ICBMs and SLBMs will possess the characteristics needed to survive a Soviet attack and retaliate against "nearly all of the hardest Soviet targets." [8] If the Air Force moves its MX missiles from silos to rail-garrison basing and deploys the new road-mobile Small ICBM, ICBMs could gain the survivability and endurance associated with the SLBM force. At the same time, the Navy has stated that the new Trident submarine and the Trident II missile system will combine the accuracy and prompt responsiveness associated with ICBMs.[9] As the traditional distinctions between ICBMs and SLBMs blur, it would appear that decision makers must use different criteria when choosing the mix of ICBMs and SLBMs in the U.S. ballistic missile force.

The United States could wait until the middle of the 1990s to adjust its forces to comply with the limits in START, but its choices would be more constrained then. Alternatively, it could plan ahead, identifying the mix of ICBM and SLBM warheads that it would like to deploy in 1998, and build towards that force during the decade. This report identifies broad choices that Congress could consider in the latter context. It focuses on three hypothetical forces that the United States might build toward during the 1990s. In the first, the United States would emphasize SLBMs; it would continue to deploy one Trident submarine each year and would reduce its forces by eliminating warheads carried on ICBMs. In the second, the United States would emphasize ICBMs; it would retain 2,000 warheads on its ICBMs and would then reduce its forces by cutting the number of warheads carried on Trident submarines. In the third force, the United States would retain the balance of ICBM and SLBM warheads that exists in the current mix, with approximately one-third of the ballistic missile warheads on ICBMs and two-thirds on SLBMs. In this case it would have to reduce the number of warheads on both ICBMs and Trident submarines.

FORCE 1: EMPHASIZE SLBMS, REDUCE ICBMS

As one alternative, the United States could deploy a ballistic missile force that consisted primarily of SLBM systems. In this case, the United States would continue to deploy Trident submarines at the rate of one per year so that it would have 21 Tridents deployed by the end of the 1990s and three more under construction for deployment after 2000. With 24 8-warhead missiles on each of these 21 submarines, the Trident fleet would carry over 4,000 warheads, or more than 80 percent of the ballistic missile warheads permitted under START. (This compares with approximately 67 percent today.) The United States would then have to reduce its ICBM force from 2,450 today to fewer than 900 warheads to comply with the limit of 4,900 ballistic missile warheads. This ICBM force could include 50 ten-warhead MX missiles, with the remaining warheads deployed on either older Minuteman missiles or new Small ICBMs.[10]

By deploying this type of force, the United States would signal a change in the missions, as they have been defined historically, of U.S. ICBMs and SLBMs. With the sharp reduction in ICBMs, the United States would have to rely largely on the responsiveness of the Trident submarines and the accuracy of the Trident II missiles for prompt attacks against the range of hardened targets in the Soviet Union. The United States could still rely on ICBMs to attack a smaller number of targets. For example, with their high accuracy and responsiveness, the 500 warheads on MX missiles could be used to attack some high priority, closely spaced targets, such as Soviet ICBM silos. The remaining Minuteman missiles or Small ICBMs, with one to three warheads on each missile, could be used to attack more isolated targets, such as command posts or individual targets during the conflict.

At the same time, the large Trident fleet would continue to ensure that the United States deployed several thousand warheads that could survive and retaliate in the event of a Soviet first strike.[11] And, with more than 4,000 survivable warheads on submarines, Navy spokesman contend that the U.S. ballistic missile force would retain the lethality generated by the current ballistic missile force of more than 8,000 warheads, if submarines can launch their missiles while they are in transit to their stations, even though the United States would reduce the number of deployed warheads to comply with the START limits. This objective, retaining at least 4,000 ballistic missile warheads on survivable systems, could serve as a benchmark for U.S. forces under START.

Implications for Strategic Modernization Programs

The Trident Submarine Program

A ballistic missile force that relies heavily on submarine-based systems would not require any change in the planned Trident program.[12] In the most recent Five Year Defense (FYDP), the Navy outlined plans to deploy 21 Trident submarines, with one submarine being authorized each year through FY1994 and one submarine entering the force each year through the end of the 1990s. In recent congressional testimony, Vice Admiral Daniel Cooper, Deputy Chief of Naval Operations for Undersea Warfare, testified that the Navy would like to build 24 Tridents, of which 3 would be in overhaul at any one time and would not count under the START ceilings.[13]

The United States began to deploy the new Ohio class (Trident) ballistic missile submarine in 1982. Ten of these submarines had been delivered to the Navy by the end of 1989, and Congress had authorized full funding for the construction of an additional seven submarines. The first eight submarines were initially deployed with the Trident I (C-4) missile, but they will be modified during the 1990s to carry the larger and more accurate Trident II missile. Beginning with the ninth submarine, which was deployed in March 1990, the Tridents are being equipped with the Trident II (D-5) missile. Both the Trident I and the Trident II missile would carry and count as eight warheads under a START agreement.[14] As a result, each Trident submarine would carry 192 ballistic missile warheads and the fleet of 21 Tridents would carry 4,032 warheads.

Program Alternative—Slow Trident Production

Congress might choose to slow the Trident program so that the Navy would acquire one new submarine every two years, or possibly two every three years, rather than one new submarine every year. This option would slow the pace at which the United States would have to eliminate ICBMs and it would provide the administration and Congress with more time to determine whether warheads on Trident submarines could accomplish the missions usually associated with ICBMs. A slower production rate could also offer near-term, annual savings in the Trident program. However, the Navy estimates that slowing the program, so that the United States produced one Trident submarine every two years, could increase the cost of each $1.4 billion submarine by up to $180 million.

The ICBM Modernization Programs

This ballistic missile force structure, with its sharp reduction in the number of warheads carried on U.S. ICBMs, could lead to changes in the ICBM modernization programs. The Bush administration plans to move the 50 10-warhead MX missiles from fixed silos to rail-mobile launchers between 1992 and 1994.[15] It also plans to deploy up to 500 single-warhead Small ICBMs on road-mobile launchers.

Figure 4 depicts how the deployment of Trident submarines, and the limit of 4,900 ballistic missile warheads, would affect the U.S. ICBM force. With up to 20 Trident submarines, the United States could comply with the START by eliminating Minuteman II missiles and reducing the number of warheads carried on Minuteman III missiles. However, if it deploys all 21 Tridents planned for in the current FYDP, the United States would have to eliminate all of its Minuteman missiles and deploy fewer than 500 of the new Small ICBMs.[17] If the Navy builds 24 Trident submarines, and all count under START, the United States could deploy no new Small ICBMs and it would have to dismantle 21 of the 50 MX missiles.

The deployment of a ballistic missile force then left room for 368, or fewer, Small ICBMs, which appear on Figure 4 with the deployment of 21 or more Trident submarines, may raise questions about the viability of the Small ICBM program. Some analysis indicate that as the number of missiles declines, the survivability, and therefore effectiveness, of the Small ICBM force might also decline.[18] The level of survivability of a reduced Small ICBM force might be maintained if the Air Force continued to base the missiles at a large number of locations. However, if Congress determined that a Small ICMB force that deployed fewer than 500 missiles would not be cost-effective, it could choose to cancel the program.

However, if the United States does not deploy a single-warhead missile, the ballistic missile force would lose the flexibility needed to attack certain targets efficiently. The missiles in the deployed force—the Trident II, MX, and Minuteman missiles—would all carry multiple warheads. From a planners perspective, some warheads might have to be "wasted" if there were not enough targets within the "footprint" of the MIRVed missiles.[19] Such a circumstance may not be acceptable under START, when the United States would be limited to 4,900 ballistic missile warheads. Consequently, if the United States does not proceed with the Small ICBM program, it may choose to reduce the number of warheads carried on each Minuteman III missile. By removing one or two warheads from each missile, the United States would be able to retain a greater number of missiles and it would be able to strike a larger number of discrete targets. These missiles, though, are based in vulnerable silos, so they could only be used at start of a conflict.

If the Trident submarines and their Trident II missiles can attack the full range of hardened targets with the prompt responsiveness and accuracy usually associated with ICBMs, this type of force mix could provide the United States with a credible deterrent force that satisfies the criteria outlined by the Department of Defense. Nonetheless, if the United States deploys more than 80 percent of its ballistic missile warheads on a single type of missile and submarine, the force could become vulnerable in the future. For example, the availability of U.S. ballistic missiles could drop sharply if Trident submarines, Trident II missiles, or their warheads developed problems that raised questions about the reliability of the entire system.[20] In addition, some analysts believe that the Soviet Union might eventually develop a means to track and destroy U.S. ballistic missile submarines. Consequently, even if SLBMs could accomplish the same missions as ICBMs, the United States might prefer to retain a greater number of warheads on ICBMs as a hedge against problems with the Trident systems and improvements in Soviet ASW capabilities.

FORCE 2: EMPHASIZE ICBMS, REDUCE SLBMS

The United States could retain most of the warheads currently deployed on ICBMs. It would then have to reduce the number of warheads on SLBMs to bring its forces into compliance with the prospective START limit of 4,900 ballistic missile warheads. In this case, the United States might dismantle its Minuteman II missiles, then maintain a force of 2,000 ICBM warheads on MX missiles, Small ICBMs, and Minuteman III missiles. With the submarine-based systems reduced to 2,900 warheads, U.S. land-based ballistic missiles would carry more than 40 percent, as compared with the approximately 30 percent in the current force, of the ballistic missile warheads permitted under START.

By maintaining a robust ICBM force, this potential force structure would preserve the traditional concept of sustaining deterrence through a balanced triad of strategic forces. The maintenance of a significant force of ICBM warheads could be justified as a hedge against the possibility of a Soviet breakthrough in antisubmarine warfare or the possibility that Trident submarines could not receive timely communications during a Soviet nuclear attack. Military considerations, in particular an effort to deploy at least 4,000 ballistic missile warheads on survivable systems, might argue for an ICBM force with survivability comparable to that of an SLBM force. To accomplish this objective, the United States would have to deploy mobile ICBMs in this force mix.

Implications for Strategic Modernization Programs

The Trident Submarine Program

The deployment of 2,000 warheads on ICBMs within a START framework would require changes in the Navy's planned structure for the Trident fleet. This section discusses possible alternative Trident force structures.

1. Reduce the Number of Planned Trident Submarines.

If the United States decided to retain 2,000 ICBM warheads under START, and further chose to deploy each Trident with 24 8-warhead missiles, it could only deploy 15 Trident submarines. This Trident fleet would carry 2,880 warheads. Because Congress has already authorized funding for 17 Trident submarines (seven of which are in various stages of construction), the Navy would have to halt construction and cancel contracts for the last two ships.

Because each submarine with its 24 missiles costs approximately $3 billion dollars, the production of 15, rather than 24, submarines might in theory save over $20 billion. However, in the past, Navy spokesman have stated that the Navy would like to deploy more Trident submarines to maintain confidence in the suvivability of the fleet, so this alternative could raise questions about the survivability of U.S. submarines. In addition, this alternative would close down the Trident production line, making it difficult for the Navy to produce additional Trident submarines if the threat or the arms control environment were to change. Moreover, the United States has incurred substantial costs in the construction and long-lead funding for Tridents beyond the 15th. These costs, when combined with contract cancellation penalties, would be expected to reduce the savings of this option. Consequently, the administration and Congress might explore several alternatives that would permit the production of additional Trident submarines, but would alter the way the warheads on these submarines would count against the limits in START.

2. Authorize Funding for Three "Non-START" Tridents

At the START negotiations in Geneva, the United States has proposed that a START agreement not count the warheads on some ballistic missile submarines, on the principle that both countries have several submarines in overhaul each year. The U.S. proposal would exclude the warheads carried on up to 72 SLBM launchers (the number on three Trident submarines), and the warheads on a like number of launchers on Soviet submarines if the submarines were undergoing overhaul, conversion, or modification. Under this counting scheme, the United States would be able to build 18 Trident submarines, rather than 15, along with its 2,000 warheads on ICBMs. With this alternative, the Navy could complete the Trident submarines that are under construction and Congress could provide the requested funding for the 18th Trident in the FY 1991 defense budget. At the same time, Congress would not fill the FY 1991 request for long-lead funds for the 19th and 20th ships.

This proposal would provide the Navy with three additional Trident submarines that might hedge against uncertainty in both the negotiations and the future threat. This option would also keep the production line for Trident submarines open for a few more years, which would provide a hedge against possible changes in the Soviet Union and the arms control environment.

On the other hand, a START provision permitting the United States and Soviet Union to build launchers for several hundred ballistic missile warheads that would not count against the agreement's limits would reduce the depth of the cuts in strategic forces under START. Because START is portrayed as limiting the countries to 6,000 warheads, the increase in the number of remaining weapons could fuel cynicism and weaken support for the agreement. It might also provide the United States and the Soviet Union with a modest breakout potential. For example, the Soviet Union would have several additional submarines available to add to its fleet if the negotiation faltered or the threat to the Soviet Union changed. It may place a high value on these submarines because it will probably have to reduce the number of submarines in its force sharply to comply with START.[21]

3. Reduce the Number of Launchers on Trident Submarines

If the Navy removed 6 launch tubes from each submarine, so that each Trident carried 18 8-warhead missiles, the United States could deploy 20 Trident submarines along with the 2,000 ICBM warheads. The Navy could explore several options to reduce the number of launchers on each submarine, including welding shut some launch tubes or physically removing a section of tubes from the submarine. Appendix C describes these options in more detail.

Although this alternative would permit the deployment of a greater number of Trident submarines, it could entail unacceptable costs for the United States. For example, as Appendix C describes, physically altering submarines to remove launch tubes would be costly and technically challenging; it may prove to be an impractical idea. The Navy might also have to remove submarines from service for at least a year, which would temporarily reduce the number of operational submarines. On the other hand, if the United States (or the Soviet Union) reduced the number of operational launch tubes without actually removing them from the submarines, the countries would possibly have to permit intrusive inspections to ensure that the launchers had not been restored to an operational status.

4. Reduce the Number of Warheads on SLBMs

The Navy could reduce the number of warheads carried on its Trident submarines by reducing the number of warheads carried on each SLBM. For example, if each Trident missile carried 6, rather than 8, warheads the Navy could deploy 20, rather than 15, Trident submarines. The United States and Soviet Union have agreed that the Trident missiles would count as eight warheads under START. However, START probably will permit the countries to reduce the number of warheads carried on their missiles if they are willing to permit short notice inspections to confirm that the missiles actually do carry the lower number of warheads. Navy spokesmen have stated that these inspections could occur aboard Trident submarines in port, with proper procedures and security measures.[22]

Removing warheads from SLBMs would not impose the costs or the time in overhaul that would be needed for the Navy to remove launch tubes from a Trident submarine. However, this alternative could create risks for the United States because it might provide the Soviet Union with a way to break out of the limits in START if it also reduced the number of warheads counted on its missiles. Random inspections would probably deter Soviet efforts to add warheads on a day-to-day basis, but they might not deter this action if the Soviet Union felt that war was imminent or it was preparing to launch a first strike.[23]

ICBM Modernization

A ballistic missile force that included around 2,000 ICBM warheads probably would not require changes in the Bush administration's proposed ICBM modernization program because the warheads added under this plan, which calls for the deployment of two mobile ICBMs, could fit within the START limits.[24] The MX missiles moved to rail-garrison basing and 500 single-warhead Small ICBMs would be deployed on road-mobile launchers. These missiles could be based on military reservations in the southwest or at Minuteman launch facilities [25] during peacetime, but they would be able to move away from those sites in a few minutes if the United States believed the Soviet Union had launched an attack against U.S. strategic forces.

According to the administration's modernization plans, the Small ICBM program would receive relatively low levels of funding during the first half of the 1990s. The administration requested $100 million for the Small ICBM in FY1990, and plans to request a total of $2 billion through FY 1994.[26] Funding would then increase sharply in 1995, so that the first missiles could be deployed in 1997. The total acquisition cost of 500 missiles and their mobile launchers is expected to be around $30 billion (FY1988 dollars).

Congress could continue to provide funding for the Small ICBM according to the schedule outlined by the Bush administration. This program would add to the survivability of U.S. ICBMs, and it would provide the United States with a single warhead system needed for targeting flexibility. This program could also provide the United States with a credible response if the Soviet Union attempted to break out of the limits in START. The United States could accelerate production to deploy the missiles sooner than had been planned and it could alter their basing scheme to improve their survivability in the face of added Soviet warheads.

Although the costs of the program will remain relatively low during the next few years, the amount of funding would increase rapidly during the middle of the 1990s. This type of spike in funding occurs in all programs when they reach the acquisition stage. Moreover, if defense budgets continue to decline, it may be difficult for Congress to approve the needed funds and continue the program. As an alternative, Congress might choose to accelerate the Small ICBM program, and provide additional funding during the next few years, so that the program would gain the momentum needed for it to continue through the middle of the 1990s. Of course, to accelerate the Small ICBM program, Congress would have to increase the funding for this program during the next few years.

A U.S. ICBM force that included the MX missile in rail-garrison basing and the new Small ICBM on mobile launchers should provide a credible deterrent. With 1,000 warheads on mobile ICBMs and 2,880 warheads on SLBMs, the United States would deploy approximately the same number of survivable warheads as it would in the force that included over 4,000 warheads on Trident submarines.

Congress may choose this type of force mix without funding the deployment of two mobile ICBMs. The Small ICBM program might be particularly vulnerable to budget pressures. The MX in rail-garrison costs much less than the Small ICBM, so it might survive budget contractions. However, many have questioned whether this program would provide the United States with a truly mobile, survivable system. The trains carrying the missiles would have to disperse onto the nation's rails several hours before an attack occurred. In theory, the trains would be dispersed as one of the many actions that the United States takes during a heightened alert for U.S. forces. Yet, some critics believe the United States may be slow to disperse the trains if it did not want to exacerbate a crisis or risk accidents on the rails. In that case, even if the missiles are moved to railroad cars, the United States may not deploy a truly mobile system.

FORCE 3: MAINTAIN CURRENT BALANCE OF ICBMS AND SLBMS

The United States could deploy a ballistic missile force that approximates the current mix of ICBM and SLBM warheads: roughly one-third on ICBMs and two-thirds on SLBMs. This mix would correspond to that shown in Figure 4 with the 18th Trident submarine; that is, 1,444 ICBM warheads (30 percent) and 3,456 SLBMs warheads (70 percent). The administration's FY1991 defense budget requests funds to procure the 18th Trident.

Because the United States would reduce the number of warheads carried on its ICBMs, it would have to rely more on the responsiveness of the Trident submarines and the accuracy of the Trident II missiles for prompt attacks against the range of hardened targets in the Soviet Union. And, because the United States would reduce the number of warheads carried on its SLBMs, it would have to deploy a significant portion of its ICBM warheads on mobile missiles to reach the benchmark of 4,000 survivably-based ballistic missile warheads.

On the other hand, this force structure would not demand as great a change of missions as either of the other two force structures. With over 1,400 warheads deployed on ICBMs, as compared with less than 900 in the first force structure, the U.S. ability to strike promptly at Soviet hardened targets would not rest so heavily on the responsiveness, reliability, and continued survivability of Trident submarines and Trident II missiles. And, with over 600 additional SLBM warheads, this force structure would not be as dependent on the survivability of mobile ICBMs as would the second force structure.

Implications for Strategic Modernization Programs

The Trident Submarine Program

By retaining the current balance of ICBM warheads and SLBM warheads, the ballistic missile force could not include 21 Trident submarines, with 24 8-warhead missiles on each submarine. Congress might consider several of the alternatives described in the preceeding section (Force 2) to structure the Trident fleet.

For example, Congress might stop funding the Trident program at 18 submarines. With 24 8-warhead missiles on each submarine, this Trident fleet would carry 3,456 warheads. In this case, Congress could approve the Navy's request for funding for the 18th submarine during the coming year, then stop the program. This alternative could save some money when compared with a fleet that would include up to 24 submarines. On the other hand, if the Soviet Union accepts the U.S. proposal to exempt the warheads on 3 submarines from the limits in START, the United States could build 21 Trident submarines within the agreement's limits on ballistic missile warheads. This option could also provide the United States with a hedge against changes in the arms control negotiations or the Soviet threat because the production lines for Trident submarines would remain open for three more years.

The United States could also deploy more than 18 submarines if it reduced the number of launchers on each submarine. By removing 4 launchers from each submarine, the United States could deploy 21 Trident submarines with 3,360 warheads, which is a little less than the 3,456 warheads that had been deployed on just 18 submarines. As an alternative, the Navy could reduce the number of warheads carried on each SLBM. For example, by deploying each Trident missile with 6, rather than 8, warheads the Navy could deploy 24 Trident submarines within the limit on ballistic missile warheads. The United States would not need to exclude the warheads on 3 submarines from the limits in START to complete the Trident program with 24 submarines. And both of these alternatives would hedge against changes in the threat or arms control environment by continuing Trident production throughout the 1990s.

ICBM Modernization

A ballistic missile force that included around 1,450 warheads on ICBMs might not require changes in the planned ICBM modernization program. The United States could move the 500 MX missiles from silos to rail-garrison basing and complete the deployment of 500 new Small ICBMs. The remainder of the force could consist of older Minuteman III missiles.

Because this force would reduce the number of warheads carried on submarine-based systems, the United States would need to deploy mobile ICBMs if it wanted to have some 4,000 survivable ballistic missile warheads under START. However, because this force would include more SLBM warheads than the second force structure, it might also include fewer warheads on mobile ICBMs. Consequently, Congress could choose to cancel one of the two mobile ICBM programs. The cancellation of the rail-garrison program could save approximately $5 billion. Without the MX in rail-garrison, the United States would have to rely on the new Small ICBM to enhance the survivability of the ICBM force. However, the MX missiles could remain in silos, so the United States would still deploy 1,000 warheads on new ICBMs. If Congress chose to cancel the Small ICBM program, it could save around $23 billion in remaining acquisition costs for this system. It would reply on the MX missile in rail garrison to disperse so that it could survive a Soviet first strike.

Following the criteria outlined by the Department of Defense, this type of force structure would provide the United States with a credible deterrent if the Trident submarines and their Trident II missiles can indeed attack the full range of hardened targets with the prompt responsiveness and accuracy usually associated with ICBMs, and if ICBMs have the mobility needed to gain the survivability usually associated with SLBMs. However, because this force structure retains more ICBMs than the first force structure, it might provide a greater hedge against possible technical or survivability problems in the Trident fleet. In addition, with a greater number of SLBM warheads than the second force structure, this force would reduce the demands placed on the survivability of the U.S. ICBMs. Consequently, although the United States would have to expect more from both types of ballistic missiles than it currently does in the absence of START, this third force structure could relieve some of the pressure that the other forces would place on a single leg of the strategic triad.

CURRENT OPTIONS AND FUTURE CHOICES

This report assumes that the United States would have to fit its ongoing strategic modernization programs into the current START framework by the end of the 1990s. However, future arms control negotiations (such as START II) could further complicate the force mix choices described in this report. Although the United States and Soviet Union have not yet completed the text of a START I agreement, continued improvements in the relationship between the two countries would make it likely that they will discuss further reductions in their strategic forces during the 1990s.

Although it is too early to speculate on an outline for a second START agreement, many observers believe that such an agreement will mandate further reductions in ballistic missile warheads. The Bush administration has indicated that it would like to discuss limits on land-based MIRVed missiles and focus on a possible ban on mobile MIRVed ICBMs. These types of limits, if combined with the strategic modernization programs pursued during the 1990s, would add to the difficult force mix choices that the United States will have to make to bring its forces into compliance with arms control limits.

Further reductions in ballistic missile warheads might sharply reduce the number of U.S. ballistic missile submarines, even if the United States chose to emphasize SLBM warheads, as in the first force structure described in this report. For example, if START II eliminated an additional 1,000 ballistic missile warheads, and the United States deployed approximately 80 percent of the 3,900 warheads on ballistic missile submarines, the United States might have to dismantle five submarines. If the Navy wanted to retain its submarines, it would have to remove two warheads from each missile, or six missiles from each submarine. If START II reduced the number of ballisitc missile warheads permitted in START I by an additional 50 percent (to approximately 2,500) and each Trident carried 24 8-warhead missiles, the United States could deploy only 10 or 11 submarines. Even if it removed 6 launchers from each submarine or 2 warheads from each missile, the United States could only deploy around 14 Tridents. If this reduction in the number of Trident submarines were to threaten the survivability of the Trident fleet, the United States might consider developing a new SLBM with fewer warheads, or a new submarine with fewer launchers, so that it could continue to deploy a greater number of submarines.[27] Because it will take many years to develop, test, and deploy new systems, Congress might have to consider such an option during the next few years, before the United States has to comply with START I.

Further reductions in ballistic missile warheads, and possible limits on MIRVed ICBMs, might also affect the choices that Congress makes during the next few years for the U.S. ICBM force. The administration has requested funding for two mobile ICBMs: the MX in rail-garrison basing and the Small ICBM on road-mobile launchers. The declining defense budget casts doubt about whether Congress will fund both programs. Cost considerations, and interest in the quick deployment of a mobile system, may argue for continued funding for the MX rail garrison program. However, if the United States has to reduce its ICBM warheads further under a second START agreement, and START II banned MIRVed mobile ICBMs, the remaining U.S. ICBM force could consist of 50 10-warhead MX missile in silos. The United States would not have gained the survivability it expected from the deployment of a mobile system. And, with ten warheads on each vulnerable missile, some believe the remaining ICBM force could pose a threat to stability, particularly in a crisis.[28] In addition, as the number of U.S. warheads and the number of clustered Soviet targets declines, the United States might want to deploy missiles with one, or a few, warheads each to enhance the targeting flexibility of the ballistic missile force. Hence, under these circumstances, a single warhead small ICBM in either silos or mobile basing might appear more attractive, even though it would cost more to deploy than the MX in rail-garrison basing.

This glance ahead towards a START II agreement indicates that a START II agreement could affect the U.S. forces chosen under START I by changing the relative value of additional Trident submarines, the MX rail-garrison program, and the Small ICBM. Further reductions in ballistic missile warheads, and a possible ban on MIRVed mobile ICBMs, might force the United States to dismantle systems that it invests in during the 1990s. To avoid the cost of deploying, then dismantling, new systems, the United States might consider changes in the strategic programs during the next few years.

APPENDIX A

Table I details U.S. ballistic missile deployments and current Defense Department modernization plans through the 1990s. It does not adjust those forces to comply with the limits in a prospective START agreement. The numbers in this Table were used to generate Figures 1 through 3 in the report. The following assumptions were used in generating this Table:

Retirement of Older U.S. Strategic Weapons Systems

The United States is currently planning to retire its Poseidon submarines as they reach the end of their service lives; the last is scheduled for retirement in the late 1990s. Because submarines are taken out of service, and dismantling begins, a few years before the official retirement date, none of these submarines would be accountable under START by the latter part of the decade.

Submarines and SLBMs

Trident submarines will begin to count under the START limits when they begin sea trials. This is 2-3 months before their scheduled delivery. The report assumes that a total of 24 Trident submarines will be authorized by FY1996 and that the last Trident will be delivered in FY2002.

The number of warheads attributed to Trident II (D-5) missiles includes those on missiles backfitted on 8 Trident submarines between FY1993 and FY1998, and those on new START-accountable Trident submarines. The report assumes that both the Trident II and the Trident I (C-4) missiles count as 8 warheads, in accordance with the Joint Statement issued following the U.S.-Soviet summit in Washington in December 1987.

ICBMs

The report assumes that the initial operational capability (IOC) for the Small ICBM occurs in 1997, as per the Defense Department schedule.

The report assumes that the Air Force will attempt to maintain a number of ICBMs that is as close to the present force of 1,000 ICBMs as possible. As a result, when it retires the Minuteman II missiles, it will replace them on a one-for-one basis with the Small ICBM.

(1) The forces outlined here correspond with the forces described in the report:
Force 1: Emphasize SLBMs, reduce ICBMs.
Force 2: Emphasize ICBMs, reduce warheads on SLBMs.
Alternative 1: Reduce the number of Trident submarines.
Alternative 2: Reduce the number of Trident submarines; deploy three that do not count under START.
Alternative 3: Reduce the number of warheads carried on Trident submarines by removing launch tubes.
Alternative 4: Reduce the number of warheads carried on Trident submarines by removing warheads from SLBMs.
Force 3: Maintain a balance of ICBMs and SLMB warheads roughly equal to the existing balance. Alternatives 1–4 are the same as those in Force 2.
(2) The United States has proposed that the warheads on launchers on three Trident submarines not count against the limits in START. This row indicates the number of submarines that would count under START in each force.
(3) The United States could deploy a greater number of submarines if it reduced the number of missiles carried on each submarine. This alternative assumes that each submarine would carry 18, rather than 24 missiles.
(4) The United States could deploy a greater number of submarines if it reduced the number of warheads carried on each missile. This alternative assumes that each missile would carry 6, rather than 8 warheads.
(5) Each force includes some number of warheads on older Minuteman III missiles. These account for the difference between the total number of ICBM warheads and the number on MX missiles and Small ICBMs.

APPENDIX C

There are several approaches to reducing the number of SLBM launch tubes on Trident submarines in order to reduce the number of warheads on the Trident fleet. These approaches differ in terms of engineering complexity, reversibility, cost, time required, and the ability of national technical means to verify the reduction.

The simplest means of reducing the number of launch tubes is to weld shut the doors of the tubes that are to be disabled, or to remove the doors and weld a metal plate over each tube. The missiles in the tubes would be replaced by ballast cylinders. This approach is fast, cheap, and simple. The countries may wish to use on-site inspections to confirm that the tubes have been sealed shut. The problem with this approach is that it can be reversed easily and relatively quickly. Consequently, even if the countries inspect the submarines periodically, it might be possible to unweld or replace missile tube doors and to replace ballast cylinders with missiles quickly for breakout.

A second approach is to cut out the upper part, or headworks, of perhaps six tubes on each submarine. This would remove the door and the door seat for each tube. Rebuilding the headworks would probably take several months, so a country could not reverse this process rapidly. In addition, the countries probably would not need to confirm this change with on-site inspections because the area involved is roughly 20 feet in width by 30 feet in length, which is large enough for observation with national technical means. However, if the fairing—the part of the hull above the pressure hull that permits the submarine to carry a missle whose length exceeds the hull diameter—covers the headworks, the countries may want to conduct periodic inspections to verify that the headworks had not been replaced. In Trident submarines, the fairing extends well back of the missile tubes and extends a few feet above the pressure hull. If the fairing is simply replaced after the headworks have been removed, a country might try to reconstruct the headworks under the fairing. Periodic inspections could deter this effort. If a notch were left in the fairing so that the destroyed headworks were visible, satellite observation would suffice. This notch, though, would interrupt the flat surface of the fairing, so it might be a source of noise, which would increase the Trident's vulnerability to Soviet antisubmarine warfare.

Before the United States could remove the headworks so that some number of launch tubes would not count under START, the Soviet Union would have to accept this procedure in the START negotiations. The Soviet Union might find this approach advantageous if it wanted to reduce the number of launch tubes on its submarines and increase the number of SSBNs it could retain under START. On the other hand, historical precedent may make the Soviet Union reluctant to permit the United States to employ this solution. When the Soviet Union wanted to convert some of its Yankee submarines from SSBNs to cruise missile carriers, it wanted to remove the headworks from the launch tubes so that the submarines would not count under SALT. The United States, however, insisted that the entire missile compartment be removed. The Soviet Union converted one Yankee in this manner.

A third approach to reducing the number of SLBM tubes counted under START is the physical removal of the tubes. Under this approach, the Navy would slice out a section of the hull containing perhaps six missile tubes. It would then insert and reweld another section without missile tubes. This section would be needed because the section to be removed contains space for uses other than missiles, such as crew berthing, and because removal of about 30 feet of the submarine would affect its trim and steering.

Although "detubing" is a straightforward engineering matter, its execution would be complex. For example, Trident submarines are designed to specifications that silence naturally-occurring resonsances. Breaking apart and reassembling the ship without changing the design to account for changes in the submarine could result in radiated noise. Care must also be taken to avoid "sound short-circuts" (means by which sound can travel directly from the intenal equipment to the hull), and to ensure that the hull segments are perfectly round to minimize noise as the submarine passes through the water. If the refit were done at the same time as a major overhaul, little added time might be needed. (All Tridents except the lead ship, Ohio, under a 12-month nonrefueling overhaul lasting 18 months.) In 1994, Tridents will begin overhaul at the rate of roughly one a year. At issue in a START environment would be whether one "detubing" each year, during the overhaul, would convert enough Tridents to meet START ceilings by the time these ceilings entered into force.

The Navy has not studied the cost of removing launch tubes from submarines. In March 1986, however, it estimated that it would cost around $410 million to overhaul, refuel, and convert a Poseidon submarine to a cruise missile carrier. (This compares with $142-$166 million for the overhaul and refueling alone). To convert the submarine to a cruise missile carrier, the Navy apparently would have removed the SLBM compartment and inserted a compartment capable of carrying and launching cruise missiles. The cost of removing six tubes from a Trident would presumably be lower because the new segment would be shorter and would not contain missile launch tubes.

Because it would take many months for a country to remove launch tubes from a submarine, and the process could be readily observed by national technical means, on-site inspection would not be required. (The United States was satisfied that the Soviet Union had removed the missile compartment from a Yankee submarine on the basis of national technical means of verification.) The advantage of "detubing" is that reversing it—removing the new segment and reinserting a segment with missile tubes—would be time-consuming and visible, so it would not provide a ready opportunity for breakout by either side.

FOOTNOTES

[1] The forces correspond with the forces described in the report and detailed in Table 1:

Force 1: Emphasize SLBMs; reduce ICBMs

Force 2: Emphasize ICBMs; reduce warheads on SLBMs

Alternative 1: Reduce the number of Trident submarines

Alternative 2: Reduce the number of Trident submarines; build three that do not count under START

Alternative 3: Reduce the number of warheads on Trident submarines by removing launch tubes (detube). This assumes that each Trident submarine would carry 18, rather than 24 missiles.

Alternative 4: Reduce the number of warheads on Trident submarines by reducing warheads from SLBMs (demirv). This assumes that each missile would carry 6, rather than 8 warheads.

Force 3: Maintain a balance of ICBM and SLBM warheads roughly equal to the existing balance; Alternatives 1-4 alter the Trident force in the same way as described in Force 2.

[2] For the past few years, Congress has asked the administration to identify the forces, with the preferred mix of ICBM and SLBM warheads, which the United States might deploy under a START agreement. Both the Reagan and Bush administrations have declined to identify a preferred ballistic missile force structure because they believed such a force might limit U.S. flexibility at the negotiations in Geneva. They also did not want Congress to limit U.S. flexibility, in Geneva or in its modernization programs, by committing the United States to that force with legislation or the budget process. As a result, the Bush administration responded to Congress with a report that outlined several possible force structures, each of which would comply with the limits in START. See U.S. President (Bush). Report to the Congress on the Analysis of Alternative Strategic Nuclear Force Postures for the United States Under a Potential START Treaty. Washington. July 25, 1989.

[3] Although President Bush rejected an Air Force proposal to retire the Minuteman II force during the next few years to save on maintenance and operating costs, Secretary Cheney has stated that the Air Force would dismantle these missiles when the United States and Soviet Union conclude a START agreement. The 450 missiles would be eliminated at a steady rate of 64 each year during the 7-year elimination period in the treaty. See Fulghum, David. Scrapping Old ICBMs Rejected. Air Force Times. January 29, 1990, p. 27. See also Adams, Peter Cheney Seeks Hold on Minuteman II Improvements. Defense News. February 12, 1990. p. 42.

[4] Under the prospective provisions, START will limit the countries to 6,000 warheads on ballistic missiles and heavy bombers. Planned U.S. forces will also exceed this limit on total warheads. However, if it reduces its forces to comply with the limit on ballistic missile warheads, the United States will come into compliance with the limit on total warheads.

[10] This study assumes that the United States would dismantle Minuteman missiles and reduce the Small ICBM force before dismantling MX missiles for the following reasons. The Minuteman missiles are more than 20 years old and would probably be dismantled before more accurate, powerful, and modern MX missiles. In addition, the MX would probably be preferred over the Small ICBM because the MX is already deployed in silos and can be converted readily to a mobile mode with only minor modifications. The remaining acquisition cost to convert the 50 MX missiles, currently deployed in silos, to rail-garrison basing is about $5.4 billion, as compared with $23.5 billion (FY88 dollars) to deploy 500 small ICBMs.

[11] Tridents are highly survivable in the face of open-ocean antisubmarine warfare. They are extremely quiet in an environment in which sound is by far the most effective way of conducting large area searches. However, Tridents could be more vulnerable as they transit out of their bases at Kings Bay, GA and Bangor, WA if the Soviet Union attempted to track them with attack submarines or destroy them with mines. The fewer Tridents deployed, the easier the Soviet Union might find it to track Tridents. In addition, the loss of just a few could have a significant effect on the lethality of the Trident force. In past testimony to Congress, Navy officials have indicated that these risks could call into question the survivability of the Trident fleet if it deployed fewer than 21 Tridents. See the responses of Admiral C.A.H. Trost, Chief of Naval Operations, in U.S. Congress. Senate. Subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations. three Tridents, on the principle that the countries will have several inoperative submarines in overhaul each year.

[16] The missiles would be deployed on 25 trains, with two missiles per train, and the trains would be located at seven Air Force bases.

[17] A force of fewer than 500 Small ICBMs may be consistent with the administration's plans. 500 missiles has always been considered the maximum size for the force.

[18] The Air Force has indicated that if a smaller number of missiles were deployed, they would probably be based at a smaller number of locations. Hence, they would disperse into a smaller area during a Soviet attack. The Soviet Union might be able to barrage the area and destroy a significant percentage of the missiles. Concerns about command and control, force reliability and availability, and U.S. anti-submarine warfare have in the past, limited Soviet reliance on SLBMs. Instead, the Soviets have long emphasized land-based ballistic missiles, and are likely to continue to do so under START with the deployment of a new version of the SS-18 in silos, along with mobile SS-24 and SS-25 missiles. See U.S. Library of Congress. Congressional Research Service. START: A Current Assessment of U.S. and Soviet Positions. Report No. 88-400 F, by Steven A. Hildreth, Al Tinajero, and Amy Woolf. [26] Congress authorized a total of $2.147 billion for ICBM modernization in FY1990. It did not specifically authorize $100 million for the small ICBM, but it did acknowledge that this amount could be taken from the total amount available for the ICBM programs.

[28] If some number of warheads are deployed on a small number of missiles (such as ten warheads on each of 50 MX missiles) and these missiles are deployed in a vulnerable basing mode, such as ICBM silos, an attacker could destroy any of these warheads with just a few of his own weapons. In this situation, an attack becomes theoretically attractive, especially in a crisis. By deploying a given number of warheads on a larger number of missiles, so that each individual missile is a less attractive target, this potential instability can be reduced.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. GRAMM addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas.

AMENDMENT NO. 1590

(Purpose: To provide military personnel the same political freedoms as Federal civilian employees)

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Texas [Mr. GRAMM] proposes an amendment numbered 1590.

On page 3, strike out lines 1 and 2; and insert in lieu thereof:

"or

(C) any member of the uniformed services, including any National Guard or reserve personnel;"

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, this is a straightforward amendment. This subject has been indirectly debated on many occasions on the Senate floor. I think I can be brief in arguing for the amendment.

A case has been argued that repeal of the Hatch Act in terms of political involvement of the civil service will in no way disrupt decades of merit system selection and operation of the Federal Government. Proponents claim that there is no inherent conflict in the fact that people working for the Federal Government also who have a kind of tenure which only the Federal Government can give, may become heavily involved politically, too.

Let me make it clear I am not swayed by that logic, or lack thereof, but I do see an overriding flaw in the legislation before us. The problem is that this bill chooses among different people who work for the Federal Government. It says that letting the FBI become involved in politics, perhaps encouraging the local FBI agent be a precinct chairman, allowing the Federal Election Commission staff director to be involved in partisan politics as, say, a campaign manager, is OK. But this same bill does not allow the young men and women who stand guard all over the world, who have brought us to the verge of winning the cold war, to exercise the same political rights as people at the FBI or the FEC.

Mr. President, it seems to me that if you went out into the countryside and asked, "are you more concerned about the first sergeant at Fort Hood being able to be involved in the political process, soliciting money from his fellow Federal employees, being a precinct chairman, being a campaign director, or are you more concerned about the local head of the IRS being similarly involved in partisan politics," I submit that the vast majority of the people of America would say, "Well, if we are going to let the IRS be involved, we ought to let people who serve in the Armed Forces of the country be involved."

So what this amendment says is that if we are going to grant these new political rights for partisan involvement to our civil employees, that the same rights should be extended to those who wear the uniform of our country.

It is also clear, that if the safeguards in this bill against coercion are sufficient for Federal civilian employees, then they would be sufficient so far as the military is concerned.

Mr. President, I cannot understand why anybody would oppose this amendment. If our objective is to alter the decades-old system that precludes partisan politics from operating within the Federal Government, it seems to me that we should remove those restrictions from the people who wear the uniform of the country, who help defend the very freedoms that we claim to be promoting here.

So, Mr. President, my amendment is clear and simple. It treats uniformed services the same way you treat the Federal Election Commission, the same way you treat the CIA, the same way you treat the FBI, the same way you treat the local IRS agent. If they can be involved in partisan politics, those who wear the uniform of the country should have that right as well.

I am hopeful there will not be much debate. If this amendment fails, I guess I am going to begin to wonder if maybe there is an objective here to pick and choose, based on the plain, old, partisanship, or at least somebody's projection as to what the political feelings of the various members of the branches of our Government might be.

I yield the floor.

Mr. LIEBERMAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. LIEBERMAN. Mr. President, I rise to oppose the amendment proposed by my friend from Texas, and I do so with a certain sense of mixed feelings, because as I have indicated here earlier in this debate, I personally believe, unlike I guess the Senator from Texas, that the restrictions on the political freedom of 3 million Americans, because they happen to work for the Federal Government, are unwarranted, inconsistent, and ultimately un-American, because they deprive these 3 million of our fellow citizens of the essential definition of what it means to be an American, which is political freedom, the right to be involved in affecting the course of the Government which so deeply and dearly affects our lives. That feeling that I have would go for all categories of public employees, both civilian and military.

The Senator from Texas talked about the 100 years of Civil Service in our Nation and the development of this outstanding Civil Service System we have—and I certainly believe that is true—and all the tradition that is involved in that. But there is another tradition that we ought to give some deference to, and not act hastily to break that tradition. It is the tradition of separating the treatment of the military employee from the treatment of the civilian governmental employee, when considering legislation or rules governing employment or retirement, including benefits. And I think that that tradition is one that ought to be respected and not changed hastily and dramatically as a result of an amendment proposed on the floor during debate on this bill.

Military service is, and in many ways should be, put in a separate category from other employees of the U.S. Government. Let me just go over some of the ways in which we have created the separation and, in fact, one would be hard put to find ways in which there is not separation, the way we treat military employees from civilians.

The system of pay is different and separate. The system of retirement is different and separate. The system of health insurance and health care is different and separate. The system of promotion and employment perks is different and, again, it is separate.

Obviously, there is nothing to prevent the Department of Defense from proposing changes in the military system that might bring some rules and regulations in line with those in the civilian sector and nothing to prevent those who represent and speak for the enlisted men and women in our armed services, both active and those who are retired, from coming forward and recommending changes of that kind. In fact, they have already done something just along that line with regard to the present Hatch Act.

Should they wish to make changes to these rules, if the bill before us, S. 135, becomes law, I am sure that the Armed Services Committee of this Congress would be interested in examining such proposals and what their consequences might be. These are some questions that I think, just on brief consideration of the amendment of the Senator from Texas, ought to be considered and answered before we act.

For instance, is a military person on the job for 24 hours a day? We know that inherently the nature of military service is different from civilian service—at least almost every category of civilian Federal employ I can think of. A military employee is essentially on call 24 hours a day and has to be ready to respond to a call to duty.

If that is true, under this bill, S. 135, that employee presumably, it may be argued, could engage in no political activity at any time, including fundraising, because they were essentially on duty 24 hours a day. Another question that might be asked is, If the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas should pass, will there be organizations established of military personnel that can form a political action committee and solicit money and contribute money?

Those are serious questions. They are questions that involve dramatic change in the way life has been conducted in the military for a long time in our country. And they are questions that suggest, I respectfully submit, that one should look at this amendment pretty carefully. In fact, hearings ought to be held on it; testimony ought to be received, and then we can all decide in a more methodical and thoughtful manner where we ought to go.

The fact is that this amendment was not considered by any Government Affairs Committee, which has reported this bill. It has some obviously serious consequences that have not been examined in a deliberative way. I just do not think we should open up at this point this particular box without considering all the ramifications.

As I understand it—and we are checking on this now—the fact is that the military, the Department of Defense has, over the years in the rules it has promulgated for political action by military employees, roughly tracked the Hatch Act. If that is so—and we will check that—I would guess that the intent of the proposal by the Senator from Texas may indirectly be achieved, and that the changes we would enact would roughly be tracked.

But before we break the tradition of separate treatment of the military, because the military is different, in this impetuous act, I think we ought to step back and do some thinking on it. That is why I respectfully suggest that this amendment is unacceptable and should be defeated.

Mr. GRAMM addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas.

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, I think I can be brief on this in my response. First of all, the FBI and CIA are on duty 24 hours a day and, yet, this amendment says that they can be involved in partisan politics. Nothing in my amendment would eliminate the prohibition against labor unions for the uniformed services, something that I oppose.

Mr. President, the bottom line is this: If we are gong to let people who work for the Internal Revenue Service, who have a profound impact on the lives of thousands of our citizens, become politically involved, then why do we want to preclude the military from having similar freedoms?

Mr. President, there is no single reason in the world that someone would do that unless they felt that somehow they were going to be benefited by politicizing the civil service, but that they were going to lose by politicizing the military service.

I guess the question we have to ask ourselves here is, are we reforming or are we really engaged in partisan politics on the floor of the U.S. Senate? If it makes good sense to politicize the Internal Revenue Service, if it makes good sense to politicize the FBI, if it makes good sense to politicize the CIA, then clearly it makes good sense to let some staff sergeant who is standing guard in Europe or Asia, who is helping to win the cold war, it makes perfectly good sense to allow that staff sergeant to say: "Yes, I am a Republican. Yes, I support a strong national defense. No, I am not in favor of raising taxes on working men and women in America." But clearly my dear colleague from Connecticut does not want that soldier to be involved.

Mr. President, if in fact we are going to make a step toward politicizing employees of the Federal Government, which I deeply question in terms of its wisdom, there is no logic whatsoever to denying that right to people who wear the uniform of the country. How does it make sense to say that some civilian employee doing exactly the same job in the Pentagon as a uniformed service employee can be involved in partisan politics, but the person who wears the uniform cannot be involved?

Mr. President, I do not think it does make sense. I think the only way you can make that argument is if you want to be selective. The view of this amendment is if you are going to politicize the civil service, we ought to allow people who wear the uniform of this country to be involved in partisan politics. My view is that if one policy makes sense, both policies make sense, and the only real logic for denying the ability of the uniformed services to be involved is if those who want to deny them that ability have confidence they will benefit politically from the involvement of civilian employees but also have confidence they will lose from the political involvement of soldiers, sailors, airmen, or marines.

My view is if you are going to give political involvement to one group you ought to give it to both.

I think the amendment speaks for itself and I for one am ready to vote on it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KOHL). The Chair recognizes the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Connecticut I thought made a good case. I was listening to it on the speaker in the other room while I was out of the Chamber for a little while.

I take drastic exception to my distinguished colleague from Texas saying we are trying to politicize the CIA, trying to politicize the FEC, trying to politicize the IRS, trying to politicizing everybody. We are not. What we are trying to do with S. 135 is very simple. What we are trying to do is make some sense out of the present Hatch Act. It has so many different rulings and interpretations to it that nobody knows what it does and does not do.

What we say is on the job you can do nothing. Off the job you still cannot raise money, you cannot run for public office yourself. We keep those protections in.

That is pretty simple and straightforward and takes away a lot of this murky aspect that has been so confusing with regard to the Hatch Act. It does not politicize anybody. It does not force anybody to be political. It does not politicize any function in Government whatsoever.

Now, let me talk about the military because that is a little bit different, and for this reason. We talk about on duty, off duty with regard to Government employees. In the military you are technically on duty 24 hours a day. You are subject to call any time day or night. There is no such thing as strictly off duty unless you are on leave.

Should we permit the military if they wish to be politically active on leave or whatever? I have no quarrel with that, given the same function as everybody else, the same right to do what everybody else has during those time periods. But your normal time around the base you are on duty for 8 hours a day, but when you go home you are still on call. You are still on call. That is different. So, realizing that what we have done through the years is say, military, you are the ones in charge. You are the ones that know your local situation. You are the ones that know what has to be done in your particular service. Therefore, you make up the rules.

What have they done? What they have done in this. They have said OK, the Hatch Act is the rule for Government employees and for everybody else, and so we will pattern our regulations in the military to reflect the Hatch Act as much as we can. But we still at the same time recognize we are in a very special situation with special responsibilities; special calls may be made on people to come back to the base in the middle of the night, or whatever. And granted that does not happen very often. I know. I spent 23 years under rules like that in the Marine Corps. It does not happen; occasionally it does. But the military has tried to basically follow the Hatch Act, but change it enough so that that is adapted to the military situation specifically.

So I would hate to see us pass something that says, military, you have to take the Hatch Act, period. That is it, no matter what.

Maybe the military if we asked them can come back to us and show us where this particular amendment would be OK with them or not OK with them. I do not know. But to just force it on them when we know out of the past that the military has in the past adapted their own version of what could be called the Hatch Act, in effect they have based it on the Hatch Act. We have a list here of some of the things. I will not bother reading through them now. I will be glad to provide a copy to the minority side if they so like. That is the main reason why I would oppose this amendment.

One thing I do want to make very, very clear. No one is trying to politicize the CIA. S. 135 does not politicize the CIA, does not politicize the FEC, does not politicize the Department of Justice, does not politicize anyone. What it does is clarify current law basically. So to say what you can do on duty, which is nothing, you cannot even wear the infamous campaign button we brought up a hundred times here and you cannot wear that if a public employee now if you are on duty. Off duty you should be able to do anything that anybody else in this country does. As an American you should not have your rights unduly restricted. You should not have your rights restricted more than necessary to accomplish whatever the good purpose is, and that is basically what this bill does.

So, Mr. President, I agree with my distinguished colleague from Connecticut who was floor managing a few moments ago and will be back shortly. I agree with what I heard him say and I rise to oppose this amendment.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes Senator GRAMM.

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, let me be brief by simply saying you can write a long list of civilian employees who are on call 24 hours a day from FBI and CIA agents to the firefighter who is working at a military base. So, granted, there is a special facet to the relationship between military personnel and the Government, but it is far from unique.

I cannot understand the passion of our dear colleague from Ohio for assuring the political freedom for civilian employees but no passion whatsoever for the similar freedoms for those who defend the freedoms for everybody else. Either this bill makes sense for all Government employees or it makes sense for no Government employees.

How do our military personnel feel about repeal of the Hatch Act? I do not know. Let me also say I do not know how civil service feels either. I know how public employee labor unions feel. I am not aware anybody has done any kind of effective survey that indicated that rank and file civilian employees want a protection which they have always had against pressure to be involved in partisan politics removed.

My guess is that the vast majority of our civilian employees do not want the Hatch Act repealed. But my point is one of logical consistency, and I think the amendment stands or falls on that argument alone.

Does it make sense to allow all of these other Government employees to be involved in partisan politics and not allow the uniformed services similar involvement? I say no. Either this bill is wrong for everybody or it is right for everybody, and that is the question posed by this amendment.

I yield the floor.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, this has come up on the floor repeatedly during this debate. The opponents of the bill keep referring to this as the Hatch Act repeal. That just is flat not right. That just does not state it correctly. We keep hearing that over and over again. This is not a Hatch Act repeal. I wish we would stop hearing that. It gives the wrong opinion.

I certainly will not accuse my good friend from Texas of any such thing, but I think this has come up so many times I am beginning to believe that it is being deliberately misstated, perhaps, by some people because this is in no way, shape, or form a Hatch Act repeal. All you have to do is read it.

what it does is bring some sense out of the Hatch Act which has had so many interpretations through the years, some 3,000 or so that were incorporated into it under the old civil service rules when this thing was passed back in 1939, so many interpretations that if anybody wants to go through them again, I will be happy to debate those again because I can give some examples. And that is all that we tried to do was correct some of these crazy things that have come out under the Hatch Act through the years.

Mr. President, we talk about the infamous campaign button that you can wear to work but you cannot do anything else there. You can give a $1,000 contribution but you cannot attend a rally. You cannot stuff envelopes. Now you could take that $1,000 check and you could, if you were a member of a firm that does mailing, you could use that $1,000 to pay for people to do a professional mailing job, but you could not go stuff envelopes yourself. That is one of the interpretations under this act. Does that make any sense? No, it does not, not to me.

Let us say we are all in Dallas. We are going to have a big Republican rally down there and you have a Government employee who wants to come stand in the back. George Bush is going to be there. There is going to be a big whoop-de-do. This is a big rally for Republicans.

Now this Federal employee comes in the back of the room and wants to see what is going on. Now I think that is great. What does he do? He stands back in the back of the room and somebody says "I have to go out and repark my car. It is on the meter. Hold my sign for a minute."

He says "OK. Fine. I am leaning back here and I will hold this fellow's sign." Do you know he is violating the law? He could be penalized by interpretations under the present Hatch Act because he holds that sign back there waiting for somebody to come back. But he is at a political rally and he is holding a political sign, and that is wrong under the Hatch Act. That is wrong.

Now take him outside that political rally hall. What can he do when he goes back home? He can plaster his car all over. He can have George Bush, Ronald Reagan stickers, stickers of every candidate, if he wants to, all over his car and the windows. He can put the big placards on the side of his car, put them in his front yard. But if he gets caught holding one at a political rally, he is in violation. He can be penalized for that. That is under the present Hatch Act.

If your "Hatched" you can express your opinion about a candidate publicly. What is publicly? But it goes ahead to say you cannot make a speech or campaign for or against a candidate.

Now what is speaking publicly? If I am going to be heard by somebody when I speak, that is speaking publicly, I guess. But when does it become a speech? I am not sure that it turns into a speech if one other person shows up. I have had some rallies like that, incidentally, too, about two or three people there. But when does it become a speech? When does it become something that goes beyond just expressing myself publicly? Is it one, 2, 4, 100 people. What is it? I do not think anybody has defined that.

It is more than just a joke, too, because, as we have said before on the floor here, in the State of Washington, Navy shipyard workers were notified they could not actively participate in the State's Presidential caucuses—caucuses now, not a primary, but caucuses—because they were going to violate the Hatch Act.

There are a couple of other things, too, one of which is you cannot exceed writing one letter to five newspapers or five letters to one newspaper. Why a limitation like that? Yet that is the interpretation under the present Hatch Act that that is what people are permitted or not permitted to do.

Do these things make sense, just these few, little examples? I do not think they do. And that has happened under the Hatch Act. It has been so fuzzy, so murky, about what people could or could not do, so people do not know what they could do. And people have been caught in violations and they did not even know they were violating anything.

Others have used the murkiness, the uncertainty of this law, in turn, for their own nefarious purpose, whatever it was, to scare people in or out of politics. Is it right that we have a system like that, that is in the law, that is called the Hatch Act?

All we are trying to do with S. 135 is not to politicize anybody, not to politicize anything, not to say anyone has to take any political action whatsoever. We are saying if you wish to have a limited amount of political activity, which we provide for here, to do that, you absolutely cannot do anything on the job, even wear that infamous campaign button.

The distinguished Senator from Wyoming yesterday said how would a Republican feel going in sitting down and the person across from him with the IRS sheets in front of him that is going to monitor his account, the fellow is sitting there with a bid Dukakis button? That was the example used yesterday afternoon.

Well, you know what we do in this bill, we improve the Hatch Act in that respect because under this legislation, you could not do that. You cannot wear identification of your preferences to work if you are a civil servant, Federal employee. But off the job, off the job that evening, there is still some things you cannot do. You cannot raise money, you cannot go solicit contributions from the general public. And you also cannot declare and run for public office yourself. Outside of that, why should people not, off the job, be able to participate?

And so it clearly defines the lines so that there will not be the misunderstanding that has hampered people up to now. Are we forcing anyone into any kind of political activity? Are we encouraging them to do anything they do not want to do? Absolutely not. That is all we try to do.

Now there are all sorts of weird things you can dream up of what if, what if, what if, what if. I guess we come down to some common sense, finally. But when people keep getting up on the floor and talk about us politicizing organizations, politicizing IRS, politicizing FEC, politicizing all kinds of different Government organizations, they are not forced into one single iota of politicization that they do not have right now. Because all S. 135 does is it clarifies what they can do and what they cannot do on the job and off the job. It takes away all these myriad interpretations that have left some of the silly restrictions that I read off just a few moments ago here. And that is all the bill does.

It increases the penalties. We had an amendment the other day here for violations. I want to see that continue. I supported that the other day here. I became a cosponsor of it, as a matter of fact. The amendment was put in by Senators ROBB and WARNER. Senator ROBB initiated that, I believe, and Senator WARNER became an original cosponsor. I signed on all also. That increased the penalties to 3 years and a $5,000 fine, potentially. So that is where we stand.

It is for those reasons that I oppose the amendment by my distinguished colleague from Texas. At the appropriate time, I guess, he will move to a vote on that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. ROTH].

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, I congratulate my distinguished colleague from Texas on offering an amendment that proposes to put the military personnel in exactly the same position that S. 135 would place civilians. Those advocating S. 135 have based their repeal—and I emphasize the word repeal and not reform—for civilian employees on grounds that they, the civilian employees, are being denied a very fundamental right of participating in the political process. Some have even argued so far that it is a denial of their constitutional rights.

If we accept those arguments—and as I have pointed out on prior days, the Supreme Court has, of course, held the Hatch Act to be constitutional—if we buy the theory that it is improper to deny civilian Federal employees the right to participate in the political process, it is just as true of military personnel. There is absolutely no reason for extending it to one group and not to the other group. Those who serve in the defense of our country, those who serve in the Army, Navy, and Air Force are citizens just exactly as civilian employees are, entitled to the same rights and protection of the Constitution that civilian employees are entitled to.

So, as I said earlier, I applaud the junior Senator from Texas for offering this amendment because, if S. 135 is to become law, then it seems only just and fair and right that the same opportunities to participate in the political campaigns ought to be extended to the military.

The distinguished chairman, is opposing this amendment, has used a number of arguments that have been used in opposition to other amendments. Let me say again, S. 135 does not only simply amend the Hatch Act, it represents a basic repeal of the Hatch Act.

Again, if we read the language of the current law, the Hatch Act, we will find that it is diametrically opposite to what S. 135 provides. The current law, section 9(a) of the Hatch Act, which the committee says, "is widely regarded as the heart of the Act," according to the majority report, provides:

An employee in an executive agency or an individual employed by the government of the District of Columbia may not—

Not "may," "may not"— take an active part in political management or in political campaigns.

It is a complete prohibition; a complete restriction on the rights of those who are employed by the Federal Government to become involved in partisan political activity.

What does S. 135, the legislation before us, provide? Section 7323, "Political Activity Authorized; Prohibitions," says:

An employee may—

It does not say "may not," which is what the law now provides, but it says—may take an active part in political management or in political campaigns.

If that does not represent repeal of the basic concept of the Hatch Act, I really do not know what does. I might say, many other distinguished organizations, such as Common Cause and the American Bar, as well as others, agree that this represents a repeal and not a simple clarification.

The distinguished chairman of the Governmental Affairs Committee refers to what he calls some of the confusions written into the present law. I maintain that while these rules and regulations can always be improved upon, can always be simplified, the concept is very simple as to what they are saying.

What the Hatch Act provides is that, yes, you, as a Federal employee, may express your personal opinion, not once, not twice, but five times, if that is your desire, so long as it is your personal opinion. What you cannot do is become invovled in a political campaign, a partisan action whereby you are promoting or demoting some political candidate. That is a very simple but important distinction.

The Office of Special Counsel has written a pamphlet to help guide Federal employees. In one section the question is:

May an employee write a letter to the editor of a local newspaper, expressing an opinion on a partisan issue?

And the answer is:

Yes. But employees may not write letters in connection with political parties or partisan groups or candidates.

That is a very important distinction and one, in my judgment, that ought to be maintained. But, again, an employee can write one letter, two letters, or eight letters, so long as he is expressing a personal opinion and is not part of a political campaign.

Mr. President, the purpose of this legislation is to protect the employees, the Federal employees, protect the Government and protect the public, and that is what the Hatch Act has done so well for the past 50 years. One of the concerns has been to protect employees from political coercion, from being subject to subtle pressures, direct or indirect, to take political activity in one form or another, whether or not the employee is on duty or off duty.

What S. 135 would try to do is to draw a distinction between what one does on duty and off duty. Let me say, it is very clear that a Federal employee can be coerced by a superior, by a fellow employee, off duty as well as on duty.

The threat or promises, the opportunity for promotion or demotion are just as real, whether the promises or threats occur directly or indirectly, off duty or on duty. The enactment of S. 135 is not going to eliminate the so-called ambiguities, the conflicts, the need for clarification of the Hatch Act. It is only going to make it much more complicated, much more difficult.

So, Mr. President, let me conclude by going back to the major thrust of my good friend and colleague from Texas, who is arguing with great merit that the Federal employee and the Federal military personnel should be treated the same when it comes to partisan political action. If we are going to let the civilian participate, then we should permit the military to participate. The precise, exact arguments can be made with respect to the fundamental rights of participating in the political process for the military that exists for the civilians.

So I urge my colleagues to vote for the Gramm amendment, an amendment which brings equity and fairness to S. 135, particularly if one accepts the proposition that all personnel of the Federal Government should be entitled to the same opportunity to be involved in partisan political activity. I yield back the floor.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I do not know whether there are others who wish to speak on this subject or not. That can be ascertained. I will be prepared at the appropriate time to move to table the amendment. I do not want to cut off debate.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I move to table the amendment of the Senator from Texas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from Texas. The clerk will call the roll.

So the motion to lay on the table amendment No. 1590 was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move to reconsider the vote.

Mr. GLENN. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, we have been waiting for other amendments to be brought to the floor. There has been a great deal of delay. Can the Chair tell me when the last vote ended?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The last vote was concluded at 4:06 p.m.

Mr. GLENN. At 4:06. So, we have waited a half-hour now for the next amendment. I do not know, Mr. President, whether there is an intentional delay here or not. We have seen a number of amendments talked about here or we discussed them privately on the floor here. But, if they are serious about this and not just trying to delay the work of the Senate, those amendments should be brought out and debated.

We have debated a number of amendments to the bill since we started considering it. We have had, I guess, 9 or 10 votes on them up to today, 5 or 6 last week. We are here ready to dispose of these things.

I ask if the other side would indulge me, if they could tell me how soon we might have an amendment?

Mr. McCONNEL. Will the Senator yield? I had planned to offer an amendment a few moments ago. We should be ready shortly. It is certainly not the intention of the Senator from Kentucky to delay. There may be others who might like to offer an amendment. I shall be ready fairly shortly. But, it is certainly not the intention of the Senator from Kentucky to delay the business of the Senate.

Mr. GLENN. Can we have an advance copy of the amendment so we can look at it, because we, too, have to look at it and study it.

Mr. McCONNELL. As soon as it is finalized, I will furnish it, at that time, to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. GLENN. I ask the floor manager, in the meanwhile are there any other amendments that we can bring up while we are waiting for the distinguished Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. ROTH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senator seeking recognition in his own right?

Mr. GLENN. I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware.

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, while we are waiting for the distinguished Senator from Kentucky to finalize his amendment, I do have a matter that I would like to respond to.

Mr. President, I would like to respond to the argument that the loosening of the Hatch Act restrictions on State and local employees has not caused any problems at the State and local level.

The Federal Election Campaign Act of 1974 repealed most of the Federal restrictions on partisan political activity by non-Federal Government employees working for State and local jurisdictions which had been enacted in 1940. Within 1 year, abuses at the State and local level had become so strong that Congress re-examined the adequacy of Federal criminal laws dealing with patronage abuses within the ranks of the ministerial civil servants.

Congressional proceedings uncovered graphic examples of laborers, fire fighters, emergency medical technicans, and the like, who were routinely required to perform political work for the incumbent political authority who employed them. In many instances, they were fired or punitively transferred because they refused to kickback a portion of their salaries to political bosses. The outcome of these hearings was Public Law 94-453, which expanded the scope of 18 U.S.C. 600 and 601, two Federal criminal laws pertaining to patronage abuses in the administration of Federal programs at the State and local levels.

However, this legislative action was not sufficient to stem the tide of abuse. In the second half of the 1970's, the Supreme Court was required to address the extent to which the Bill of Rights protected rank-and-file government workers from being harmed in their employment on account of their political associations, their political activity, or the lack thereof.

In 1976, the newly elected sheriff of Cook County, IL, abruptly terminated a large number of line deputy sheriffs merely because they had either been registered in the political party of the old sheriff, or because they had failed to work for the new sheriff's election. The Supreme Court in Elrod versus Burns held that the first amendment right of association protected rank-and-file public employees from being fired merely because of their political affiliations. In 1980, in Branti versus Finkel, the Supreme Court was once again required to visit this issue, and held this time that the principle propounded in Elrod applied to assistant public defenders in New York State, who were terminated by a newly elected chief public defender because of their membership in the "wrong" political party.

The prevalence of this practice of firing local deputy law enforcement officers who fail to support the campaign of an elected chief is underscored by the fact that just such a situation occurred 2 years ago in Arlington County, VA, where the incumbent sheriff first demoted, and then eventually fired several line deputy law officers who had supported the sheriff's opponent in a recent election.

According to the Department of Justice in its views to the committee on S. 135:

> Several examples of patronage abuses at the state and local level which have been investigated by this Department illustrate the magnitude of the problem the Hatch Act has successfully kept from the Federal doorsteps.

In 1975, Congressman J. Edward Roush of Indiana testified before a House subcommittee in support of increased penalties under 18 U.S.C. 600 and 601, at which time he provided the Congress with several examples of specific written demands from the party in power in his home State to rank and file government personnel, many of them firemen, road laborers, and the like, for the political donation of a percentage of their Government salaries.

In 1985, a special Federal grand jury in the Northern District of Illinois, Chicago, issued a report on the dynamics of the fraudulent election practices for which Chicago has, until recently, been infamous. After several years of hearing testimony, and after returning over 65 indictments charging Chicago officials with fraudulent voting practices, this grand jury determined that the driving force behind voter fraud in Chicago was the quest for patronage—the power of the winning political faction to control the jobs of rank and file municipal personnel and award benefits to its friends. This vicious patronage system produced corrupt government, and required aggressive political work by even the most mundane public employees in order to obtain or retain municipal jobs.

Two county commissioners in Clark County, IN, were indicted and convicted in Indianapolis during 1986 for overtly threatening a large group of highway laborers with the loss of local county jobs if they did not agree to make political contributions to the party in power. Several laborers who refused to contribute were either summarily fired, or simply left their jobs on their own accord knowing that termination was the inevitable consequence of refusing to go along with such demands. This investigation also uncovered several other situations where Clark County employees—including at least one paramedic—were punitively transferred to job sites that were far removed from their homes and children because of the employees' lack of support for the incumbent political faction.

Within the past 2 years, the Criminal Division of the Department of Justice has transferred two major patronage matters to the Office of Special Counsel [OSC] for administrative enforcement under the so-called Little Hatch Act. Extensive criminal investigations, however, failed to produce sufficient evidence to support criminal charges in these cases—mainly because coercive activity is inherently difficult to prosecute at the criminal level which requires a beyond-a-reasonable-doubt burden of proof. Both of these matters involved superior political appointees soliciting political contributions—usually in the form of dinner tickets—from clerks and administrative personnel. In one of these cases OSC succeeded in obtaining meaningful penalties, including debarment from future public employment, against the director of personnel of the Akron Municipal Housing Authority and two of her subordinates.

In the other case, Office of Special Counsel was recently successful in seeking similar penalties against several political and senior supervisory employees of the Niagara Frontier Transportation Authority for doing much the same thing. In both these instances, OSC has been successful in obtaining administrative sanctions against plainly unlawful behavior largely because the Little Hatch Act is on the books, and the evidentiary requirements of this administrative statute are far less demanding than those applicable to criminal proceedings under statutes such as title 18.

Finally, Mr. President, a Federal jury in Newark recently convicted the mayor and the city council chairman of Guttenberg, NJ, for using their authority to hire and fire police officers and school crossing guards to extract involuntary political activity from incumbent holders of such ministerial public service jobs. In one case an elderly school crossing guard was fired when one of his relatives announced his desire to run against an incumbent city councilman. In order to get his job back, the guard had to persuade the relative to withdraw from the race. Several highly qualified police officers had their contracts terminated when they failed to perform election day work for the mayor. The jury found that the defendants violated 18 U.S.C. 666, a relatively new Federal felony statute.

Mr. President, the facts are clear. There have been cases of political corruption since 1974. But even if there were not any such cases, the need for the Hatch Act at the Federal level is still clear. Coercion can be very, very subtle and very difficult to detect. It does not surprise me that the surveys of State attorneys general that the Senator from Connecticut referred to did not reveal widespread prosecutions of political coercion violations. In addition, just because the law fails to achieve any prosecutions does not mean that it is a law which should be repealed. Suppose, Mr. President, the Justice Department failed to prosecute any drug cases. Does that mean that the drug enforcement laws should be repealed?

Mr. President, the Hatch Act was enacted to defend against the spoils system. It has succeeded. I urge that we retain current law.

Mr. President, I yield back the floor.

Mr. CRANSTON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I want first to praise the Senator from Ohio [Mr. GLENN] for his leadership on this measure and for his guidance on the floor in reaching the point where we now are where we should be: Reasonably close to enacting a very important measure, important to our democracy.

Mr. President, the freedom of Americans to participate in the political process of our country is at the heart of our democracy. It is a compelling irony that as the Iron Curtain collapses under its own weight and as Eastern European nations look to our democracy as a beacon in their struggle toward freedom, the freedom of our own Federal employees continues to be severely circumscribed.

The Hatch Act blocks Federal employees who wish to exercise some of the liberties offered by our political system. While the nature of Government employment mandates some limitations where political activity is concerned, the well-intentioned Hatch Act is too rigid, too draconian, and unreflective of America.

The right to participate in the political process is one of our most valuable fundamental rights. Although there is a basis for some limitations where competing needs arise—in this case, the need to maintain a nonpartisan Federal work force—we must take special care to use the least intrusive limitation upon this fundamental right. The strength of S. 135 is that it succeeds in striking the balance between promoting and protecting the individual liberties of Federal workers, and the important policy goal of maintaining strict political neutrality in the Federal workplace.

Mr. President, if S. 135 is enacted, Federal employees would be able to participate in our political process in ways much more representative of their status as citizens. For example, Federal workers would have the right to distribute campaign literature, work a phone bank, participate as a delegate in a political caucus, and hold office within a political party. These activities would be permitted only when they are away from the work site and during off-duty hours. I stress that all of these activities would be permissible only during off-work hours.

Mr. President, S. 135 is not a blind leap in the dark. In the past few years, a number of States have eased their Hatch Act-type provisions and now allow for broader political freedoms for their State and local employees. The empirical evidence from these States show no loss in professionalism nor any increase in partisanship. By enacting this legislation, we can achieve a better balance between the rights of all citizens to participate in the process of democracy and the need to maintain a nonpartisan Federal workplace.

Mr. President, Government employees are representative of our Nation. They are diverse, not monolithic; they are reflective, not an unthinking voting bloc; they have families and other nonwork obligations and thus are faced with the same time constraints on outside activities as are other workers. The vast majority of these dedicated public servants approach their jobs with professionalism and pride. As much as anyone else, they want to ensure a nonpartisan work environment. S. 135 serves to ensure a politically neutral work force while simultaneously extending reasonable opportunities for participation in our democracy. Its time is long overdue.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I rise to reply to the comments by my distinguished colleague from Delaware.

Mr. President, I am not quite sure what we are talking about. We seem to get peaches and apples and oranges and bananas, a lot of things, all mixed up. There are an awful lot of difficulties around the country that my learned colleague refers to that have nothing whatsoever to do with S. 135.

He talks about patronage in Chicago and kickbacks in the late 1970's, the Supreme Court, and how the Bill of Rights was judged to protect workers from bias as to jobs and political influence, how the sheriff in Cook County fired employees illegally—a whole group of things that have nothing whatsoever to do with S. 135.

Former Congressman Roush says that he ran into a situation where a percentage of an employee's government salary was expected to be kicked back. That is the traditional State flower fund as it is called back home anyway.

The point I am making is these are illegal acts. They do not have anything to do with the Hatch Act. They do not have anything to do with S. 135. We might also have added you cannot vote tombstone names. You cannot stuff ballot boxes. You cannot steal a driver's license to go and be identified. These things have nothing whatsoever to do with S. 135 and the legislation that we have before us today.

My colleague says that there are little Hatch acts out there, there are minis that have been passed by the States that back up what the Federal Hatch Act does. That is exactly right. That goes to the employees in that State. Many of them copy the Hatch Act. S. 135 does make the Hatch Act finally comprehensive from all the different interpretations that have been put on it so that even those little Hatch acts are probably going to work better.

My colleague talked about Newark, NJ, the authority hired and fired school crossing guards for political purposes, an elderly guard got fired because he was going to run against an incumbent. That is illegal. The Hatch Act or S. 135 or changes thereto do not have one single thing to do with that, not one iota.

So we could go on all afternoon listing crimes the Hatch Act does not apply to and that S. 135 does not apply to if that is what we want. I do not see that anything we do here alters drug possession laws or drug sales laws or bank robbery, SEC fraud, auto speeding, or drunk driving. This does not change FDA or income tax laws or appropriations for the Department of Defense. Let us not bring up a lot of straw men to try to knock down when they do not apply to what it is we are talking about in this Chamber.

I appreciate the point my distinguished colleage from Delaware is making, that little Hatch acts out there have done a lot of good. We do not want to see them threatened. I agree with that premise entirely.

What we are doing with S. 135 I believe, and believe firmly, is strengthening the way the Hatch Act will work because we are finally making sense out of it. We are clarifying it. That is all. We are not repealing the Hatch Act. We are not repealing it. What we are doing is clarifying it so that people will know what they can and cannot do—there will not be inadvertent violations of the Hatch Act, nor can those who would intentionally subvert the Hatch Act to their own purposes have such vague interpretations of law all over the place that they can pick one here and say I can do it and get away with it because of this particular interpretation, where if they go over here they say they could not have done it that way. This clarifies it. That is all it does.

Mr. President, I would submit to my colleagues that these are all specious arguments that were brought up with regard to this because State laws apply within those particular States. What the Cook County sheriff did was against the law. I hope he was put in jail for it. Political kickbacks, as former Congressman Roush indicated, I hope somebody went to jail for that. They would not be affected in one way or another by S. 135 which is before us today.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, once again, my distinguished colleague asserts that S. 135 does not repeal the Hatch Act. As I have said on several occasions when he made this assertion, not only do I strongly disagree with that conclusion but many other distinguished organizations, including the American Bar and Common Cause disagree. They call it a repeal.

I wonder if my distinguished colleague would say, if we were to change the Ten Commandments by eliminating the word "not," that was not a repeal of the commandments. One of the Ten Commandments, for example, states that "Thou shalt not commit adultery."

Now, if one deletes the word "not," so it reads "Thou shall commit adultery," would the distinguished chairman argue that is not repeal of the commandment? I think it is. I think it is a 180-degree difference.

Mr. GLENN. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. ROTH. Yes, I will be happy to yield.

Mr. GLENN. To use the example of my distinguished colleague, is it his interpretation then that changing one word in 1 commandment changes all 10?

Mr. ROTH. I am just saying it would change that one commandment. Let me point out, in answer to the distinguished Senator, what the Hatch Act provides. The committee report says that section 9(a) is "widely regarded as the heart of the act."

And it is that part of the Hatch Act that is changed by elimination of the word "not." Just as in my illustration that "Thou shalt not commit adultery," S. 135 would eliminate the word "not."

Current law provides that employees in an executive agency or individuals employed by the government of the District of Columbia may not take an active part in political management or in political campaigns. Of course, the direct opposite is said in S. 135 and section 7325, where it specifically provided that an employee may take an active part in political management or in political campaigns.

So it is a direct reversal of direction, and not a mere simple change.

The distinguished chairman made reference to my earlier comments on the problems of corruption at the State level. He said he did not see the relevance of those provisions. But in my judgment, they are in point.

What we are concerned about, and what anyone who reads the specific language of S. 135 will be concerned about, is that we are setting up the circumstances, the conditions that could bring back a return to the spoils system where your promotions, your employment, and your future can be influenced by political activity.

Many distinguished commentators, both before the committee and in writing, have said time and again that trying to draw the line between permissible political activity and impermissible by the fact that one is on duty or off duty just will not work. A fellow employee can be just as much coerced directly or indirectly by fellow Federal employees off duty as he can on duty.

So that the division is not significant. It will not eliminate the possibility of a return to a spoils system. Instead, it will make it possible. And why should we be changing the system which has functioned so well for 50 years? There is no loud, crying demand by a majority of employees, Federal employees, for such change.

But in any event, I would like to go back to the problems of S. 135 as seen by a number of distinguished public officials, including the Attorney General, Dick Thornburgh; the Director of the Office of Personnel Management, Constance Berry Newman, who was of course the one primarily responsible for administering the laws affecting personnel; and Mary F. Wieseman, special counsel, Office of Special Counsel in this letter to me, and I quote:

> This is to inform you of our grave and unequivocal objections to S. 135, a bill that would substantially repeal the Hatch Act. If this bill were presented to the President, his senior advisers would recommend that it be vetoed.
> The Hatch Act of 1939 prohibits certain partisan political activities by federal government employees. It was enacted to remedy a century of patronage abuses resulting from the "spoils system," Federal programs to help the poor and the dispossessed were often perverted for political purposes. The Hatch Act seeks to guarantee the integrity of the federal civil service by assuring that federal employees are hired and promoted based upon their qualifications and not their political loyalties. It also assures that federal programs are administered on the basis of need, not politics. The Act's ban on active partisan compaigning by federal employees protects them from coercion and patronage abuse. Those protections remain essential to assure the integrity of the federal work force and the administration of federal programs. They also are critical to the public perception and confidence in the impartial, even-handed conduct of government business.

S. 135 would fundamentally undermine the Merit System by changing a presumption that partisan politicking by federal servants is prohibited into a presumption that such partisan campaigning is to be encouraged. Specifically, the bill would allow federal employees to hold office in political parties, work in partisan political campaigns, and solicit political contributions from other federal employees, including subordinates, who are members of the same federal employee organization.

The latter point, of course, insofar as subordinates, has now been amended so that that aspect of the letter is no longer appropriate.

Such a reversal in the role of partisan politics in the ethic of public service would permit virtually unbridled partisan activities by federal employees, which, history shows, would in turn inevitably lead to the politicization of public administration. For example, S. 135 would permit Internal Revenue Service District Managers to serve as political party officers, loan officers with the Department of Housing and Urban Development could organize partisan campaigns after work, and federal law enforcement officers could make television commercials paid for by political committees on behalf of partisan candidates.

We note that the bill provides that these newly authorized partisan activities are not to be conducted while employees are on duty, wearing the insignia of their office, or otherwise about the government's business. Unfortunately, these prohibitions would be meaningless. They add nothing to existing criminal prohibitions in this area. (see, e.g. Chapter 29 of Title 18 of the U.S. Code, and 18 U.S.C. §§ 641 and 872). Moreover, although proponents claim that S. 135 would provide protections against political coercion, the bill would actually repeal the authority of the Office of Special Counsel, found in 5 U.S.C. § 7325, to seek penalties for Hatch Act violations.

I might say that one also was taken care of in the committee amendment.

Finally, the vestige of the Hatch Act left by S. 135 could be easily circumvented. For example, government officials who belong to employee organizations could induce subordinates to join their organizations, and then they could extract involuntary political contributions of money or services, as long as this activity occurred during off-duty hours and while the participants were not in government uniforms or on government property.

The inevitable result of S. 135 would be a politicization of the federal work force to the great detriment of federal employees, the programs that these employees administer, and ultimately the public which these programs were enacted to serve. Without the Hatch Act, employees would be inevitably subject to subtle, and not so subtle, pressures to support the partisan agenda in their government offices. It is unreasonable to expect that the few prohibitions listed in S. 135 would have any practical impact on the subtle politicization that would occur in the federal work force. Rank-and-file civil servants would not make federal criminal cases out of supervisors' requests—

Again, that has been taken care of.

• • • They would find it less costly to be victimized, rather than incur the job-related risks that would surely result from a complaint to law enforcement authorities. Moveover, the difficulties inherent in proving even the most patent abuses would render the protections of the criminal justice system illusory. Thinly veiled exploitation and extortion would flourish because the politicized atmosphere of the workplace would make criminal conviction virtually impossible. The resulting impact on federal programs would undermine the public's confidence in the impartial administration of public business.

The Hatch Act ensures an environment wherein federal employees are encouraged to impartially carry out the public's business, rather than being distracted by the demands of political patronage. Under the Hatch Act, promotion is based upon merit, not political loyalty. The Act is understood by the vast majority of federal employees as a bulwark against the political pressures that would inevitably accompany a partisan public work force. Its prohibitions are clearly set forth in the statute and regulations at 5 C.F.R., paragraph 733. The Office of Special Counsel is empowered to provide authoritative advice to employees with questions about the application of the statute and regulations to particular circumstances. Last year, OSC processed about 1,400 inquiries from the approximately 3 millioin Federal employees covered by the act. We believe, on the basis of experience, that most Federal employees either understand how the Hatch Act applies or they simply have no desire to politicize their lives and their jobs by engaging in the sort of partisan activity it covers. It is, we think, significant that there has been no groundswell of popular support for this bill from the ranks of Federal civil servants.

In sum, the Hatch Act has served to shield Federal employees and the programs that they administer from political exploitation and abuse for over 50 years. S. 135, which is being promoted in the Senate as a liberator of Federal workers' civil rights, is perceived by many Federal workers as stripping them of that shield, and presages that those workers may have to demonstrate a fealty to a political party that they may not otherwise endorse. We are committed to continuing the protections of the Hatch Act and urge our colleagues to join us by opposing S. 135.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the letter be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, DC.

Hon. WILLIAM V. ROTH, Jr.,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR ROTH: This is to inform you of our grave and unequivocal objections to S. 135, a bill that would substantially repeal the Hatch Act. If this bill were presented to the President, his senior advisers would recommend that it be vetoed.

The Hatch Act of 1939 prohibits certain partisan political activities by federal government employees. It was enacted to remedy a century of patronage abuses resulting from the "spoils system." Federal programs to help the poor and the dispossessed were often perverted for political purposes. The Hatch Act seeks to guarantee the integrity of the federal civil service by assuring that federal employees are hired and promoted based upon their qualifications and not their political loyalties. It also assures that federal programs are administered on the basis of need, not politics. The Act's ban on active partisan campaigning by federal employees protects them from coercion and patronage abuse. Those protections remain essential to assure the integrity of the federal work force and the administration of federal programs. They also are critical to the public perception and confidence in the impartial, even-handed conduct of government business.

S. 135 would fundamentally undermine the Merit System by changing a persumption that partisan politicking by federal servants is prohibited into a presumption that such partisan campaigning is to be encouraged. Specifically, the bill would allow federal employees to hold office in political parties, work in partisan political campaigns, and solicit political contributions from other federal employees, including subordinates, who are members of the same federal employee organization. Such a reversal in the role of partisan politics in the ethic of public service would permit virtually unbridled partisan activities by federal employees, which, history shows, would in turn inevitably lead to the politicization of public administration. We note that the bill provides that these newly authorized partisan activities are not to be conducted while employees are on duty, wearing the insignia of their offices, or otherwise about the government's business. Unfortunately, these prohibitions would be meaningless. They add nothing to existing criminal prohibitions in this area (See, e.g. Chapter 29 of Title 18 of the U.S. Code, and 18 U.S.C. §§ 641 and 872). sures to support the partisan agenda in their government offices. It is unreasonable to expect that the few prohibitions listed in S. 135 would have any practical impact on the subtle politicization that would occur in the federal work force. Rank-and-file civil servants would not make federal criminal cases out of supervisors' requests for political contributions or for their off-duty time in support of a candidate. They would find it less costly to be victimized rather than incur the job-related risks that would surely result from a complaint to law enforcement authorities. Moreover, the difficulties inherent in proving even the most patent abuses would render the protections of the criminal justice system illusory. Thinly veiled exploitation and extortion would flourish because the politicized atmosphere of the workplace would make criminal conviction virtually impossible. The Office of Special Counsel (OSC) is empowered to provide authoritative advice to employees with questions about the application of the statute and regulations to particular circumstances. Last year, OSC processed about 1,400 inquiries from the approximately 3 million federal employees covered by the Act. We believe, on the basis of experience, that most federal employees either understand how the Hatch Act applies or they simply have no desire to politicize their lives and their jobs by engaging in the sort of partisan activity it covers. It is, we think, significant that there has been no groundswell of popular support for this bill from the ranks of federal civil servants.

In sum, the Hatch Act has served to shield federal employees and the programs that they administer from political exploitation and abuse for over fifty years. S. 135, which is being promoted in the Senate as a liberator of federal workers' civil rights, is perceived by many federal workers as stripping them of that shield, and presages that those workers may have to demonstrate a fealty to a political party that they may not otherwise endorse. We are committed to continuing the protections of the Hatch Act and urge you go join us by opposing S. 135.

The Office of Management and Budget has advised that there is no objection to the submission of this report to the Congress and that enactment of S. 135 would not be in accord with the program of the President.

DICK THORNBURGH,
Attorney General.
CONSTANCE BERRY NEWMAN,
Director, Office of Personnel Management.
MARY F. WIESEMAN,
Special Counsel, Office of Special Counsel.

Mr. ROTH. I yield the floor.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I was surprised to hear the reference to the Ten Commandments and the Biblical references, and one word changing, permitting or not permitting adultery. I only respond to say that to the 10 commandments of the Hatch Act, I add an 11th. It would read as follows:

Thou shalt not politicize thy Government job, lest S. 135 rise up to smite thee and thine employment shall be forever banned unto the ends of Government civil service.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I rise today to express my strong support for S. 135, the Hatch Act Reform Amendments of 1989. This Senator believes Congress should encourage and support the free, uncoerced participation of all Americans in our political process, including the men and women who make Government work, those who are most directly affected by the restrictions of the Hatch Act.

We should be concerned about the political rights of Federal employees. With over 3,000 separate administrative rulings, about what kinds of political activities are permissible or not, many of my constituents simply do not understand the complex restrictions upon them. Federal employees may only use a bumper sticker of certain dimensions, and a yard sign in the front yard can only be so large. If it is in the backyard, well, that's an entirely different case.

Mr. President, there are now 2.5 million Federal employees covered by the Hatch Act, and in my home State of Pennsylvania, there are over 130,000 men and women who serve in various agencies. I remember the story of one of my constituents—the wife of a letter carrier—who wanted to run for city council in Erie, PA. The woman wanted to use a family photograph in her campaign literature but the picture included her husband.

After making efforts to learn if using it would be allowed or not under the Hatch Act she was told that the safest thing was not to include him. As a result, her marital status became an issue in the election. I would certainly like to know how public policy is advanced through strict regulations of the off duty, private lives of the men and women at the post office.

Two weeks, ago, a letter carrier from Pittsburgh, PA, visited my office and explained how on two occasions neighbors have approached him and asked his help in their campaigns for elected offices in the community. He had to explain that he was unable to fully participate because of Hatch Act restrictions. This man's neighbors simply could not understand why our Federal Government still prevents our public servants from being fully involved in public service.

The civilian Federal work force of today is much different than that of 50 years ago when the Hatch Act was implemented. The spoils system that once permeated it is gone. Today, nearly 80 percent of all Federal civilian jobs are covered by the impartial system of merit and examination. Given these characteristics, there is no reason why we should not extend to Federal workers the same political freedoms civilian employees enjoy as long as protection against coercion is maintained.

During debate on S. 135, opponents have asserted that passage would lead to a politicization of the Federal work force. This will not occur. The legislation before us contains prudent and necessary potections against the coercion that would result in a politicized workforce. Federal employees are strictly prohibited from using their authority or influence or affect political activity, voting or political fundraising. Further, Federal and postal employees are not permitted to engage in any political activity while on the job, at the workplace, in uniform, or while otherwise representing the Federal Government. There is nothing ambiguous about these restrictions.

Penalties for violating the current Hatch Act can range from a minimum penalty of suspension without pay for 30 days to the most severe penalty of removal. S. 135 will put in place stronger safeguards against coercion. Under S. 135, violation of the Hatch Act could result in a maxium fine of $5,000 or a prison sentence of up to 3 years.

Last month, I had the opportunity to visit several Eastern European nations which have recently won their own political freedoms. A popular poster which hangs throughout the region shows the back of a fat-necked Soviet soldier as he heads home after years of occupation. The caption, in Russian, reads "Comrades, it's finished." The freedoms these people have been fighting for are now being returned to them and the time of Communist domination is finally over. It is time Congress said "It's finished" to Hatch Act restrictions and allowed Federal employees the same rights of political participation now being lauded with the fall of the Iron Curtain.

Mr. President, this Senator certainly understands the concerns that surround the legislation before us but they are essentially problems of free speech and political participation. The reforms embodied in S. 135 properly address these while ensuring the highest possible level of confidence and trust in Federal employees.

Mr. GLENN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BREAUX). The clerk will call the roll. The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PRYOR. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Ms. MIKULSKI). Without objection, it is so ordered.

COST OF PRESCRIPTION DRUGS

Mr. PRYOR. Madam President, I rise this afternoon with good news and bad news. The bad news is that we face a smoldering national crisis. The good news is that I believe I have at least part of the solution in a bill I will introduce on Thursday.

The crisis I am referring to has been created by years of excessive increases in prescription drug prices. It is a crisis of affordability. I am sure there are many reasons for it, but in my mind one central reason has been the greed of drug manufacturers.

During my early years as a member of both the House and the Senate, we watched drug prices bump upwards a little bit at a time, at about the same rate as prices in the rest of the economy. That was until the hyperinflation of the 1980's. Over the past decade, if we looked at drug prices in the United States, we might think we were in Argentina. These prices rose at a rate three times faster than the rate of general inflation.

Many of my constituents, especially older persons, began to write and call me and complain that they cannot afford their medications. Governors also wrote in, asking for help in controlling drug prices in their Medicaid programs. Pharmacists wrote to ask for relief from the desperate attempts to save money by cutting back reimbursement.

The only people not complaining about drug prices are the drug companies. As a result, I have grown increasingly concerned about the cost of prescription drugs. I know I am not the first one to look at this industry. Senator Kefauver came long before me, and then there was Senator Gaylord Nelson, who held hearings on this problem for 10 years. More recently, Congressman HENRY WAXMAN fought hard to get good cost data from drug companies and to protect retail pharmacies from taking the blame for drug costs. The fact is, Congress has repeatedly uncovered one example after another of pricing abuses by the industry, but has had little success in devising a solution.

With this disappointing history, we may now find a practical solution to the most intractable part of this problem—finding a fair way of negotiating the price of patented drug products. My approach, which I will describe in more detail later, does not rely on government dictates or simply passing on exorbitant costs to taxpayers, but is based on widely accepted business principles. Let me explain how I came to this solution.

After assuming the chairmanship of the Special Committee on Aging in January 1989, I made prescription drug prices a top priority: I wanted to know why drug prices are so high, and why we cannot seem to get them under control. I asked the staff of the Aging Committee early last year to find some new answers to the old questions.

I felt the need for action was urgent. Ordinary citizens are forced to go to extraordinary lengths to find less expensive drug treatment. Some find they must spend their life savings on prescription drugs. Then last year, at a time when drug costs were the highest out of pocket health care cost for three out of every four older Americans, Congress repealed the new Medicare prescription drug insurance plan.

During the time when we were trying to save the prescription drug benefit, Senators and constituents voiced their concern that we could not control the cost of prescription drugs. They pointed to the raising costs and they said, "How can we afford to keep up with these increases?" In large part, their arguments were sound. And, as a result, the 70 percent of the elderly who have no public or private insurance coverage of prescription drugs must bear the entire weight of drug cost increases all by themselves. In my view, it is our job to find a solution, not just wash our hands of the problem.

I found out during our hearings at the Aging Committee that it is not just older Americans who are suffering. The Medicaid drug insurance program—the Government's $3.5 billion health insurance safety net for the very poorest Americans—just barely survived the last 10 years.

I would like to outline briefly for my colleagues the current sad state of Medicaid. Many of you already know that Medicaid protects fewer than half of the poor in this country. We may not be aware that Medicaid nevertheless has been the fastest rising cost in State government with the single exception of the corrections budget. And within the Medicaid budget, since 1984, prescription drug costs have grown faster than any other major component of the program. According to testimony presented at the July hearing of the Aging Committee, fully 97 percent of drug cost increases during the 1980's were due to price inflation. Only 3 percent was caused by increased use of drugs.

Today, drug spending is the third largest category of Medicaid spending—at $3.5 billion, far ahead of physician payments. For 10 years, State Medicaid programs have coped by chopping and chiseling at drug coverage. States have raised copayments on the poorest poor, cut benefits, imposed coverage restrictions, and have repeatedly cut back on pharmacy reimbursement. In fact, Government has done just about everything but find a way to get manufacturers to stop raising their prices at a rate three times faster than inflation.

With tax dollars increasingly difficult to find, and taxpayers fed up with our inability to spend their money wisely, we can no longer afford to tolerate 88 percent increases in prescription drug prices, while the cost of just everything else is going up by 28 percent.

Our historical approach has been cutting back benefits and reimbursement. The problem with this strategy is that it is no strategy. In addition, it is unfair. Even though they have been targeted for cutbacks, it is not the poor people or the elderly or the community pharmacists who are causing this problem—and they cannot fix it. It is Government's responsibility—our responsibility—to find a way to get drug costs down to a reasonable level. We must find the cause of the problem and address it.

During the past decade, some 15 State Medicaid agencies have recognized that drug manufacturer prices were the source of their problem, and tried to set up price negotiations with drug companies. But rather than negotiate, in 12 of those States, the drug industry lobby defeated the Medicaid administrators in the State legislature. In the three States where negotiations have been authorized, the drug companies adopted a new tactic: They refused to compete for the State's business. They would not submit price bids.

Yet, with all this going on for years now, whenever people like me complained about high drug prices, the drug manufacturers have been able to forestall action in Congress by telling us, in effect, "Senator, you get what you pay for." I wish that were true. I wish most new drugs really were worth 50 percent more than the drugs they are marketed to replace. But it is not true. What I have learned over the past year is that we pay what they ask for.

Before I conducted my investigation, I did not realize what the companies were getting away with, or how they were doing it. When the pharmaceutical manufacturer lobbyists and CEO's come to Capitol Hill to lobby, all they talk about is how they are investing millions in cures for Alzheimer's disease, AIDS, and cancer. The price increases, they tell us, are necessary to feed the golden goose of research and development. Let us look at the facts: The drug companies' own figures reveal that only one-third of all the money they make off of price increases goes to research and development. Where does the rest of it go? Much of it goes to marketing the drugs they make.

But let us stay with the research and development budget. Where does that one-third of dollars raised by price increases get invested? How productive are they in spending consumers and R&D taxpayer-subsidized dollars? Did they tell us that the typical drug company spends only 15 to 30 percent of its research dollars on high-risk investigation of breakthrough drugs? This fraction of their research and development budget may be worth its weight in platinum for PR purposes. But it is going to take a long time to invent a cure for Alzheimer's disease at that rate.

And the rest of the research and development budget? We know from industry insiders that 50 to 55 percent goes to inventing so-called me-too drugs that duplicate, rather than improve upon, drugs already on the market.

Madam President, it is time for us to stop listening to all the industry propaganda about how much they spend on research and development and start paying attention to the outcome of the research, in terms of real improvements in the health and safety of American citizens. I invite you to look, as I have, at the independent judgments of thousands of practicing doctors and pharmacists who review patient outcome studies to determine which drugs really make a new contribution to the marketplace. They confirm what the Food and Drug Administration has found: The majority of new drugs add little or nothing to existing drug therapies.

I believe all of us already know what the drug companies cannot afford to admit: We can and should be bargaining over the price of these me-too drugs. My bill, the Pharmaceuticals Access and Prudent Purchasing Act of 1990, will change the way drug companies do business with the Government. It may very well change the way that insurance companies and employee benefits plans deal with drug companies. With luck, the Government and perhaps someday all consumers will buy according to the value of a drug product, rather than the asking price of the manufacturer. Until consumers and Government purchasers of prescription drugs learn to be prudent purchasers, we will never have a truly competitive market.

If we can get a fair price for these drugs, it will take the cost-cutting pressure off of pharmacists and beneficiaries. It means that in some States next year, Medicaid will not have to cut off funding for such programs as prenatal care.

I think we can all agree that it is our responsibility to spend wisely each taxpayer dollar the Treasury collects. The question is how are we going to accomplish this? I hope we will also agree that it is a lot better to save money by making the drug companies negotiate drug prices than to keep punishing the victims of high drug prices through further repeals and cutbacks, as we have been.

Is directly negotiating with the drug companies a new idea? No. The Department of Veterans Affairs does it; almost every hospital does it; and the majority of HMO's do it. What it all boils down to is this: How can it be that Medicaid—a program serving medically indigent poor people—pay $24 for an antiasthma drug when the DVA pays $8—one-third less—for the very same drug?

Madam President, every year we hear from the Governors about how difficult it is to manage the skyrocketing costs of their Medicaid programs. If we do not pass legislation to assist States demand better prices, it will be harder to fault the drug manufacturers for gouging our extremely limited Medicaid budgets.

There is reason for optimism. Already, the mere fact that there is increased Federal and State outrage over prescription drug manufacturers pricing policies has produced some important results. Merck, the world's largest drug manufacturer, proposes to give State Medicaid programs their lowest price and this represents a major victory. It represents an acceptance that they are charging too much for a program that serves sick and poor people. It also is important in that it is breaking to shreds the industry's historical position of no deals.

Yes, we all should be happy with the Merck development, but we cannot rest on our laurels. We all know this proposal would not have ever emerged without the pressure of recent Federal and State legislative proposals. Based on past experience, how can anyone of us believe that all the companies will follow suit and will keep their promise to always charge the program the lowest price? The industry's track record in this area can only produce skepticism.

It is important to remember, that what my legislation provides is insurance and flexibility. The Merck proposal and my legislation can be very complementary. The legislation would assure that drug manufacturers—all drug manufacturers—have the incentives to negotiate.

If all of them follow Merck's lead, then we all win. My bill allows for that, encourages it and, I think, assures it. Without the stick of my legislation, however, I do not believe we have any reason to trust that all manufacturers will, out of the goodness of their hearts, give the State Medicaid programs better deals.

Madam President, on Thursday, I will introduce legislation to assure that our States and their Medicaid programs have access to better prescription drug prices. I believe this bill, the Pharmaceuticals Access and Prudent Purchasing Act of 1990 [PAPPA] will achieve substantial savings, relieve cost saving initiatives aimed at the retail pharmacist and the poor, and assure and improve access to all needed and necessary medications. The bill accomplishes this by focusing cost-saving efforts, through direct negotiating, on the cause of the increased program outlays—the drug manufacturer.

The procompetition message of this legislation has been perceived as threatening by many drug manufacturers. In fact, I understand that many Aging and Finance Committee members have heard from drug manufacturers lobbying against this proposal even before the bill's specifications were written. In all the years I have been in the Senate, I have never seen such an extensive lobbying campaign against an idea that has yet to be formally introduced.

Madam President, I ask my colleagues one favor. Please read and evaluate my proposal and not be misled by speculation about my intent or the industry's dire predictions. I believe this initiative reflects my having taken into account most, if not all, of the substantive objections the industry has raised.

As my colleagues review the proposal, please remember who is not calling or writing to oppose it. It is not those who have had to carry the burden of difficult cost containment approaches aimed at reducing skyrocketing State Medicaid prescription drug expenditures—the Medicaid recipients, the Federal Government, the States, the pharmacists and other health care providers. Rather; it is the one participant of the Medicaid prescription drug program that has escaped all cost containment initiatives—the prescription drug manufacturers.

It is time to change this unacceptable situation in a way that is fair to every American. I believe my bill accomplishes this goal. Having said this, I know of no major bills that have been signed into law without changes being made throughout the legislative process. Along these lines, I request one favor. Before any of my colleagues make a final decision about this legislation, I welcome and request the opportunity to discuss this legislation with them.

In an effort to provide our colleagues and staff with additional information about this issue, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD following my statement a factsheet about prescription drug costs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. PRYOR. Madam President, we have a long way to go before we can assure our constituents access to affordable prescription drugs. However, if we never take the first step, we certainly will never attain that goal.

EXHIBIT 1

PRESCRIPTION DRUG PRICE FACTSHEET

PRESCRIPTION DRUG PRICE INFLATION AND ITS IMPACT

From 1980–87, 97% of increased spending on prescription drugs was directly the result of price increases. During this period, only 3% of the increase in spending on prescription drugs was due to increase use of drugs by the public.

Prescription drug prices more than tripled the general inflation rate in the last decade. From 1981 through 1988, prescription drug prices rose by 88% while general price inflation rose only 28%.

Skyrocketing drug price increases have contributed to public and private insurers' hesitancy to provide insurance to cover these costs.

The Congress repealed the Medicare Catastrophic Coverage Act, and the outpatient prescription drug program, largely because of the fear of out-of-control costs. (Note: Drug costs represent the highest out-of-pocket cost for three of four older Americans, and over 15 percent of the elderly report that they cannot afford the medications they need.)

The fact that over 60% of the elderly do not have private prescription drug insurance protection suggests that private insurers have been unable to offer insurance to cover the increasing cost of medications.

The price of a brand name drug product in a European country is, on average, one-third less than the U.S. price.

IMPACT OF DRUG PRICE INCREASES ON MEDICAID

By 1988, Medicaid paid $3.3 billion for prescription drugs, more than for physician payments, making it the third highest category of Medicaid spending.

As costs of Medicaid prescription drug programs have increased at faster rates than almost any other covered item or service, only limited cost cutting success has been achieved, almost entirely at the expense of those least responsible for cost increases—beneficiaries (through increased cost-sharing and restrictions on benefits) and pharmacists (through caps on reimbursement).

In another response to skyrocketing costs, at least 22 states have implemented drug formularies (limited lists of preferred drug products). Medicaid formularies have been generally ineffective as cost control measures largely because they are rarely used to negotiate better prices with drug manufacturers.

Many states have made their formularies more restrictive but without adequate medical and scientific analysis. An unacceptable outcome has been that many poor people cannot get needed drugs through their state Medicaid programs. Since they also cannot afford drugs out-of-pocket, these restrictions can deny access to appropriate therapy and result in more expensive hospitalizations.

HCFA has put increasing pressure on State Medicaid agencies to decrease drug product reimbursement to pharmacists. These pressures could force pharmacists to drop out of the Medicaid program, creating further access problems for beneficiaries—particularly in rural areas.

PHARMACEUTICAL INDUSTRY RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

In 1988, the average new drug was priced 50% higher than the drug product(s) it was marketed to replace. There is substantial evidence, however, that most of these products of industry research and development add little or nothing in terms of therapeutic advantages over already-marketed drug therapies.

U.S. pharmaceutical manufacturers contend that they need high profits to fund research and development efforts. In the past, Congress has agreed, providing billions of dollars in tax breaks to the pharmaceutical industry and additional billions in excessively high prices through Medicaid, the health insurance program for the poorest Americans. However, the great majority of this taxpayer-subsidized research is producing high-priced therapeutically equivalent "me-too" drug products with little or no potential for therapeutic gain over existing therapies.

For example, 60% of the new molecular entities brought to market by the 25 largest U.S. drug manufacturers between 1981 and 1988 were evaluated by the Federal Food and Drug Administration (FDA) as "C"-rated, having "little or no" potential for therapeutic gain over existing drug therapies. FDA's finding of widespread therapeutic duplication is independently affirmed by thousands of hospital and HMO formulary committees across the United States.

In the period 1980–87, U.S. drug companies spent at least $15 billion on research and development of new drugs with little or no therapeutic advantage over existing drug therapies, the so-called "me-too" drugs.

According to industry insiders, only about 20–30% of the typical brand name drug manufacturer's research and development budget is spent on discovering new, innovative, breakthrough chemical entities. Another 25–30% is spent on further development of currently-marketed drug products (for example, developing new dosage forms or new uses for existing products.) About 50% is spent on R&D for new "me-too" products.

BUSINESS PRACTICES IN THE UNITED STATES PRESCRIPTION DRUG MARKET

There are two domestic markets in U.S. for most big-selling prescription drugs: a price-competitive market, characterized by deep discounts off the published list price (benefitting the Department of Veterans Affairs, hospitals, and managed care plans, such as HMOs) and a high-priced market where retail customers, Medicare, and Medicaid purchase their prescription drugs.

In the high-priced, non-competitive market, once the patent on a brand name drug product expires and generic drug competition is introduced, the price of the brand name product does not fall; it generally increases and remains high. In contrast, however, in the price-sensitive market, buyers have succeeded in getting brand name drugs at generic drug prices.

Similarly, in the high-priced market, when a new patented therapeutically interchangeable drug (not a generic) comes onto the market, it is priced at an amount equal to or greater than its patented brand name competitor(s), whether or not it represents a significant therapeutic advance. Yet, in the price sensitive market, buyers have forced manufacturers of therapeutically interchangeable drugs to compete for market share by offering price discounts of 40% or more.

INNOVATIVE COST CONTROL STRATEGIES FOR HIGH DRUG PRICES

Hospital and Managed Care Initiatives

Physicians and pharmacists in over 90% of the nation's hospitals and at least 42% of U.S. health maintenance organizations (HMOs) have independently concluded that many prescription drugs are therapeutically interchangeable when used to treat patients suffering from the same ailment.

Using this information, hospitals and HMOs have employed limited lists of preferred drugs (formularies) and group purchasing to successfully negotiate prices with drug manufacturers that have yielded discounts in excess of 40% off the published wholesale prices.

In effect, the Medicaid program is indirectly benefiting from this negotiating process since hospitals have already implemented these sound business negotiating approaches. State Medicaid recepients, pharmacists, and other providers would further benefit from a similar negotiating process for Medicaid's outpatient prescription drug program.

Initiatives of the Department of Veterans Affairs (DVA)

The Department of Veterans Affairs (DVA) negotiates with manufacturers and obtains valuable discounts on drug products without centralized purchasing and distribution of these drug products.

DVA achieves an average discount of 41% off the manufacturer's published "Average Wholesale Price" (AWP) for single source drugs and an average of over 60% off the AWP for multiple source drugs. In contrast, Medicaid programs, in almost all cases, pay top-dollar (or at best, AWP minus 10%) for drug products.

DVA obtains these substantial discounts by negotiating low prices from the brand name drug manufacturers, aided by the use of a preferred drug list.

DRUG MANUFACTURERS' RESPONSE TO THE MEDICAID COST CRISIS

Despite the fact that Medicaid purchases over 10% of the prescription drugs in the U.S., and ignoring Medicaid's critical public mission to serve the indigent, drug manufacturers have almost without exception refused to directly negotiate better prices with the States. In fact, drug manufacturers have waged an all-out national campaign to undermine and frustrate State efforts to negotiate lower prices for therapeutically duplicative drugs.

In late April 1990, following Federal and State threats of legislative intervention, Merck, Sharp and Dohme proposed to give States their lowest price for MSD drugs if the State would agree to list all of the firm's drugs on the state formulary (if it had one). This is significant because Merck has broken away from the rest of the drug manufacturing industry and, in doing so, has acknowledged the unacceptability of the financial crisis facing state Medicaid programs.

Merck's proposal, however, is likely to have little effect on the remainder of the industry. Because other drug companies offer much greater discounts than Merck, it is extremely unlikely that many companies will (voluntarily) follow suit. Pressure from the Congress, in the form of price negotiation legislation, offers the surrest prospect of industry-wide price reductions.

OBJECTIVES OF THE PHARMACEUTICAL PRODUCT ACCESS AND PRUDENT PURCHASING ACT OF 1990 (PAPPA)

(1) Focus cost-saving efforts on the cause of increased program outlays—manufacturer's escalating drug prices—rather than on the retail pharmacist and the poor, who cannot control drug prices;

(2) Create an opportunity for States to establish money-saving Medicaid drug price negotiating programs of their own design. (Aging Committee staff estimate that such a program could save between $100–$200 million annually on a nationwide basis);

(3) Preserve successful marketplace mechanisms for enhancing drug price competition, by building on time-honored business practices already in widespread use in the market (by the VA, hospitals, and managed care providers);

(4) Restore and enhance access to medically necessary pharmaceuticals for the poor who rely on Medicaid;

(5) Preserve the physician's prerogative to prescribe medically necessary medications for individuals in their care; and

(6) Provide incentives for more manufacturers to offer discounts on drug products to State Medicaid programs.

SPARK MATSUNAGA

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I have been considering for several days how I would speak on the floor regarding our departed brother, Spark Matsunaga. No. 1, I wanted to speak extemporaneously from the heart and not from prepared script. No. 2, I wanted to say something that might convey to his lovely wife, Helene, the immense respect that Spark commanded in this body. Sometimes I think that wives of Senators do not have a full appreciation for what their husbands do here, and I guess that is understandable. Certainly they do not have any reason to have a full and keen appreciation for the respect in which their husbands are held or, should I say, maybe disrespect on occasion.

But here was a dimunitive, rather small of stature man, who had a remarkable childhood: Son of a Buddhist priest, obviously very bright, and he was offered a magnificent education if he would convert to Christianity and renounce Buddhism. He did not want to do that and certainly he was not about to do it until he consulted with his father.

I may be wrong about this, but I think it turned out that he got his education and I am not sure he was required to meet the requirement that was first offered; that is, that he renounce Buddhism. I do know he was a graduate of Harvard Law School. He was in law school, I believe in the same class with my brother, at Harvard.

When he first came to the Senate, I knew who he was, although, I did not know much about him. I have sat endless hours listening to him tell me how he loved poetry, letting him read some of his poetry to me which was not top flight. He was a lot better Senator than he was poet. He told me the story about his childhood. I remember he told me a story that he was a commanding officer of a National Guard company, and he was stationed on the island of Molokai when the Japanese attacked Pearl Harbor. I think he was a first lieutenant.

We will recall the Japanese used two-man submarines in that attack. Several of them were destroyed; one of them was destroyed, but one lonely Japanese sailor in that two-man submarine survived and walked to shore on that island. By this time, Spark's company was trying to cover the shores and do whatever they could during the attack. His company captured this lone Japanese sailor, so far as I know, that was the only prisoner taken at Pearl Harbor.

Subsequent to that time, the Army took their rifles away from them and gave them wooden guns. They were very suspect because virtually all of them were Japanese. Also at that time, we will recall one of the disgraceful chapters in the history of this country, we began to intern Japanese in this country; many of them American citizens. We took American citizens and put them in what would today be called concentration camps.

As time went by, these men in this company that Spark commanded wondered what was going to happen to them. One day they were told, "You are going to the States." They got on a boat and came to the United States. They got on a train in San Francisco and they pulled all the shades down and told them not to raise the shades. Five days later, about midnight, they pulled in some place, he knew not where, and stopped. They said, "Now you can pull the shades up." They pulled the shades up and Spark told me that there were klieg lights everywhere, barbed wire fences, high fences, and dogs.

He assumed they were all going to be placed in one of these internment camps. As it turned out, that was not the case. They were in Wisconsin, I believe, at Camp McCoy. This was a POW camp, and the duty of this company was to guard prisoners. The only prisoner there was that lonely Japanese prisoner that Spark's company had taken who walked up on that shore. Spark said what a relief it was to know that we were not going to be put in prison.

I could have gone back and done a lot of research about his heroism and the Italian campaign, I believe, in Sicily. Talk about a genuine certified war hero, Spark Matsunaga was one. But he was more than that.

He was a real role model for everybody in the U.S. Senate. Everybody knew that when Spark voted, he was voting right from the heart and the head. He never compromised. No other Senator, in my opinion, with the possible exception of Senator INOUYE, could have ever gotten that Japanese reparations bill through here. A lot of Senators here were apprehensive about the political consequences of voting to give all those people who had been interned $20,000. People said, let us just apologize to them because we violated their constitutional rights, and let it go at that.

I heard a lot of people I never dreamed would cosponsor that bill say, "I did that for Spark." As I say, I do not know that anybody else could have ever gotten it done.

I remember back in 1982 when peace was a dirty word. That is when the Soviet Union was the evil empire. I remember when my own wife started her own peace organization called Peace Links.

I thought it was going to be devastating to me politically and told her so. But in any event, she did it. It was a very risky business to talk about peace back in 1982. People who talked about peace anytime except Christmas, when you were saying joy to the world, peace on Earth, good will toward men, became suspect.

I remember I offered a resolution one day to establish a peace day, and it generated a firestorm in this body—just one day a year to celebrate peace. I have never thought about it much since. You could probably get 100 votes—no, you could probably not get 100—but you could get a lot of votes for such a day today.

Despite that firestorm which was essentially provoked by one Senator, Spark Matsunaga was never deterred. He had a bill to establish a Peace Academy. He said if we could spend $200 or $300 billion a year on weapons to make war, surely we can have one little institution to teach people conflict resolution and that you do not have to fight and kill each other to resolve every problem.

Nobody jumped on Spark, because they knew it would just be like water off a duck's back. He believed very firmly in that Peace Academy. Do you know how he accomplished that? He lobbied everybody, but a lot of people who did not want to vote for it did it because of Spark.

He was, to put it briefly and as concisely as I know how, a Senator's Senator in many, many ways—a man so full of heart and compassion, understanding, always trying to do something for the underdog, always willing to listen to any argument, no matter how crazy, from any Senator who wanted to present it.

I remember when his health began to fail. Interestingly enough, that was not the thing which ultimately killed him.

I remember when we were reorganizing the Senate after the 1988 elections; Spark had lost weight. He had obviously lost some of his hair. He told me he had Shanghai flu and shingles, and that was true. A lot of people were saying that Spark probably had cancer because he really looked like he might be terminally ill. But then he came back in the fall of 1988. We were voting on a new majority leader over in the old Senate Chamber, and in walked Spark as hale and robust and healthy looking as I had ever seen him.

I remember I rose to nominate my colleague, DAVID PRYOR, to be secretary of the Democratic conference, and I started off before I spoke on DAVID'S behalf about how pleasing and gratifying it was to see Spark back and in good health. The applause was just instantaneous and deafening, because everybody thought that whatever had been wrong with him, he was well, and we were all so pleased.

It was not long after that it became a downhill battle.

I sometimes wonder, in this body, does anybody really care what you do? I want the world to know that I cared about what he did, and I want Helene and his children to know that he was a great man in the eyes of everybody in this body I have ever talked to about him. We will miss him greatly.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

BUDGET SUMMIT CONFERENCE

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, there is sort of a buzz and chatter around the Chamber, the cloakrooms, and in the corridors of the Capitol today. Everybody is talking about budget summit conferences. These things seem to go in cycles. We have a budget summit conference and the results do not seem to live up to expectation. The next year people come back and say, no, we have to make the process work, we have to buckle down and do this job ourselves. That does not seem to work and the next year, they come back and say, by gosh, the only way we will ever get this under control is the budget summit conference. It may have been Vince Lombardi who said the more things change, the more they stay the same. It was not Vince Lombardi, I guess. Anyway, somebody said that.

Mr. President, with all this talk about a budget summit conference, it occurs to me that it might be useful, before we pin all our faith and hopes on a group of negotiators to somehow bring order out of chaos, if we looked at where we have been, because the reality is that the budget crunch we find ourselves in is not as a result of some natural disaster, it is not like an earthquake or a flood or lightning striking or a hurricane. We brought it on ourselves. In fact, within the last few days we passed another in a very long series of swollen appropriations bills. The so-called dire emergency supplemental is just another example of the kind of legislation that has now produced a situation in which some people feel we have a crisis.

We do have a crisis, but it is not a crisis that is mysterious in its origin; it is caused by the fact that year after year, in the collective judgment of Congress, we have passed spending measures far in excess of the growth rate of the economy, far in excess of the natural growth of the revenue agreement. As a consequence now, some of the sophisticates are spreading the word that the only thing to get us off the hook is a tax increase or some other kind of drastic measure.

Mr. President, I do not necessarily believe that that is true. In fact, as the prospect of a budget summit conference I gather will be officially confirmed in the next day or two, looms on the horizon, I want to make a few points, and then insert in the RECORD an overview of where we have been and where we are going on the budget deficit.

First of all, it is very, very clear that any kind of historical analysis, whether you look at the last 5 or 10 or 20 years, the budget deficit which now is approaching again truly stupendous proportions, is a result of runaway Federal spending. It is not, in my view at least, by any reasonable standard, attributable to a lack of taxes. I do not think this country is undertaxed. I think we are overspent.

It is also clear as you review the figures of the last 20 years that the lion's share of Federal spending has gone to entitlements and mandatory spending, and it has not gone to defense. The national defense has been a large expenditure, but it has been a declining fraction for a number of years and, in fact, has been declining in real terms after adjusting for inflation also for several years.

This year we have the pleasant prospect of the so-called peace dividend. I believe in the minds and hearts of many people, that as a result of the improving international association and reduction of tensions between this country and the Soviet Union, that we can safely afford to spend less for national defense. So this would seem to be an opportunity to apply those savings, of whatever magnitude they turn out to be, to reducing the overall level of Federal spending, or if that proves to be an elusive goal, at least to reducing the rate of increase in Federal spending. But instead of that, when we have the likelihood or at least the projection of an increase in Federal revenues in the next fiscal year over this fiscal year, in excess of $100 billion, plus some savings as a result of the peace dividends, instead of hearing some talk about how we are going to use this revenue stream and the savings from a lessened need for national defense to reduce the Federal budget deficit, we are told the opposite, that somehow an inevitable force is dragging us toward the tax increase.

Well, I think a review of the numbers which I am going to put in the RECORD in a moment will show that, on the contrary, we are spending plenty—in fact, so much that it is impossible for any revenue stream, even propelled by a vigorous growing national economy, to possibly keep up with it.

Mr. LOTT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I am happy to yield.

Mr. LOTT. I was listening to the Senator's remarks and agreeing very strongly with his sentiments and also thinking about the fact that we are talking about a budget in the next fiscal year of $1.24 trillion. I do not know if the Senator mentioned that particular number, but we are talking about astronomical numbers, $1.24 trillion. With that amount of spending, when we look at what we are trying to deal with in meeting the Gramm-Rudman targets, whether it is $35 billion or $60 billion, it is dwarfed by that amount of money.

It seems that clearly the problem is not that we do not have insufficient revenue; it is that we are still spending too much money, and again, to emphasize, at a time when we are seeing defense spending reduced below just a freeze, by a substantial amount of money, and revenues increasing by over a $100 billion projection in the next fiscal year, why in the world we would be then dealing also with a $56 or $60 billion deficit is beyond me. It is very simple. The Congress is still committed to unending increases in spending every year over the previous year.

The answer to our deficit problems should be to cut and control spending. And I am not talking about below what we spent in the past; just freeze it. Every year we have had an increase across the board almost in every program. I share the Senator's sentiments on these numbers.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I appreciate the observations of the Senator from Mississippi. I recall that I was elected to the Congress of the United States in 1972. It was the same year, I believe, that the Senator from Mississippi came to Capitol Hill as a Member, though he served with distinction as a member of the staff of the Congress. He and I were elected to the House at the same time. I wonder if the Senator remembers how much the Federal budget was in that year. It was less than $300 billion. So just in the few years since we have been here, Federal spending has quadrupled.

I wonder if the Senator remembers a decade ago, more or less, Ronald Reagan, that tightfisted master of the hardnosed budget, was elected President of the United States, and all through the decade of the 1980's we listened to the wails and moans of those who thought we were not spending that. Every year we were told about the draconian cuts, the hacking, slashing of Federal programs. Why, to hear the rhetoric, one would have assumed you could go into the Chamber of either House and see blood flowing through the Chamber, bits and pieces of Federal programs laying around, strewn as debris in the Chamber.

I wonder if any of our colleagues have ever stopped to think that during this decade of drastic spending reductions, we increased Federal spending from $590 billion to more or less $1.1 trillion.

Mr. LOTT. If the Senator will yield further, Mr. President, certainly I do not feel very good hearing these numbers, because we have been here during this time when the increase has been going up. We have argued against these increases year after year. As a matter of fact, when it was made to appear that we were devastating programs, we were marginally lowering the rate of increase in spending programs, whether it was domestic spending or entitlements, or for that matter, defense, and it is a very sad commentary that we cannot control our appetite any more than that.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. The Senator is right. And the only reason I cite this print and remind my colleagues about what happened over the last decade is that we are about to begin another round of budget summit negotiations. And I do not know yet what is going to come out of that, but somehow I think it is going to be something like this: In order to curtail the deficit we are going to have a tax increase; we are going to have some modest reductions in the rate of increase in domestic programs, have a sharp reduction in the rate of increase, and possibly an actual reduction in defense spending, and some cosmetic reform of the budget process.

How do I know this or why do I think I know? Because that happened before. I hate to say it, but that is what summit conferences are likely to produce.

Mr. LOTT. That is exactly what happened in the past, Mr. President. The history is very clear. We have gone through this in the past. The Senator also makes the point that in all probability there is going to be a move toward raising taxes, new taxes in addition to $13.9 billion in revenue that was in the original budget proposals that came up here to the Congress from the administration, which has generally been accepted by people in both bodies of both parties.

My question then gets to be, well, a lot of people say that there is a need for additional taxes. I do not buy that. For the sake of discussion, where do they suggest the taxes come from? Are they talking about individual tax rate increases or about gasoline taxes?

I will raise concern right now about that, because if we have gasoline tax increases anywhere, it should go into the Highway Trust Fund, not be going into the General Treasury. We should not do that anyway.

The quick answer is excise taxes. I raise the question: Who do they think pays for these excise taxes? I would like for all of us to remember, if you ask the people if they support tax increases, they will tell you overwhelmingly "No; cut spending." I just hope that our negotiators, whomever they may be, will remember that admonition as they go into these negotiations.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, the Senator is right and, of course, we have had not only a rapid increase in the amount of Federal spending in the last few years, but we have also had a rapid increase in the amount of Federal taxes. Despite a rate reduction on personal taxes, the actual dollar amount of tax collections by the Federal Government has more or less doubled in the last decade. In fact, literally, Mr. President, in fiscal 1980 we collected $517 billion. In fiscal 1990 we are expecting to collect $1.73 trillion.

So there has been a wonderful increase. It is not that this economy has stagnated. It is not that the people of the country are not doing their part. The reality is that just by a natural process, a strong, growing economy has produced a good revenue stream.

What we have not shown is that Congress has the ability to live within this revenue stream, nor frankly is there any persuasive evidence that at any level of taxes we would live within that stream of revenue.

Mr. President, to be specific, revenues grew an average of 8.6 percent per year since 1983. However, between 1975 and 1980, Federal spending rose 78 percent. From 1980 through 1985, outlays grew another 60 percent.

That is exactly the kind of runaway spending that prompted Congress, in an uncharacteristic display of fiscal responsibility, to enact the Gramm-Rudman budget restraint, exactly the legislation which now imposes a deadline and a constraint on the Congress, exactly the provision of law which sooner or later this year we are going to have to decide whether we want to waive, because that does impose in a very crude, imperfectly designed manner, some outside limitation on spending.

If we go above the limits set by the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings Act, as Senators know, there will be what is called a sequester. That is automatically, as a process of law, everything will be cranked down, or at least everything except a few selected, favored programs that were exempted will be cracked down to meet the budget target. The target is not a balanced budget. It is, in fact, this year the furtherest thing from a balanced budget. But we cannot even meet the interim target that is set out.

Some people have implied that the reason Federal spending has grown so rapidly is because of inflation. However, the growth in government spending is not primarily or entirely inflation. Measured in real terms, that is after adjusting for inflation, Federal spending grew 19 percent between 1975 and 1980; 22 percent between 1980 and 1985; and 7 percent, even during these draconian years of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, 7 percent from 1985 to 1990.

That is, after adjusting for inflation, during the same 5-year intervals, inflation-adjusted revenues grew at different rates between 1975 and 1980 when inflation was clouding economic judgment and bracket creep clobbering taxpayers of the country. Revenues advanced 24 percent, but the price of inflation was stagnation and recession.

As a result, we had a decline in real receipts in 1981 and 1983. They rebounded in 1984 and 1985 by 14 percent, and with the economy running full steam ahead, real revenues grew at 24 percent between 1975 and 1980.

Mr. President, the point is very clear: revenues, almost every year of our lifetime, have gone up. There have been a couple of years, a couple of blips in the Government's receipts when recession hit, when we had a modest decline. For the most part, they have gone up year after year after year. In any 5-, 10-, or 20-year period, they have gone up enormously. And let me say it again, the real revenues, before adjusting for inflation, the nominal revenues doubled during the decade of the 1980's.

Mr. President, let me also make the point that Federal spending as a percentage of our national economic product has continued to rise. Since 1960, outlays have averaged about 21 percent. During a certain period of time, we managed to reduce Federal spending as a percentage of the gross national product.

It has now begun rising again and has gone down in 1986 to 18.4 percent. It has been rocking along above, and we got it from 18.6 in 1985 to 18.5 in 1986. Subsequent to that in 1987, Federal tax receipts rose to 19.3; in 1988, 19.0; and in 1989, 19.2.

In the meantime, Federal spending just rode along on the crest of that 1 or 2 percentage points above receipts every year.

It is almost as if Federal spending was ratcheted not to an absolute number, but just to a percentage above whatever the tax revenues were.

Mr. President, I shall send to the desk a report by the Republican Policy Committee which reviews not only the boxcar totals of Federal spending and receipts, but which also puts into perspective the categories of Federal spending showing where we have been spending the money year by year, the portion of it that has gone to national defense and that which has gone to entitlements and/or programs.

I commend this to my colleagues' attention, and I do ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD at this time.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[U.S. Senate Republican Policy Committee, April 26, 1990]

A REVIEW OF THE BUDGET, 1970-90

The Federal budget is an enormous document. The President's Fiscal Year 1991 proposal alone is 1569 pages. Who knows how many numbers it contains. Add to that the publications of the Congressional Budget Office and the House and Senate Budget committees, and you're really swimming in numbers. Fortunately, a picture is worth a thousand words. This paper is a collection of charts tracking the Federal budget from 1970 to 1990. (Charts not reproducible in the RECORD.)

As the deliberations of the FY91 budget proceed, the following charts and talking points may be useful. This presentation of the budget looks at spending and revenues in nominal and inflation-adjusted dollar amounts, as percentages of spending and revenues, and as percentages of GNP. These summary observations provide information on fiscal trends and developments over the past 20 years.

Several points recur from chart to chart, including:

The budget deficit is the result of runaway spending, and not due to a lack of taxes.

The lion's share of funding increases have gone to entitlements and mandatory spending over the past 20 years.

Considerable progress has been made on deficit reduction, in terms of both inflation-adjusted dollar amounts, and as a percent of GNP. Further progress should come from spending restraint.

Republican fiscal policy in the future should include the goal of continued reduction of the Federal sector's share of the whole economy, thereby promoting greater opportunity and prosperity for all through the primary source of economic growth—the private sector.

The fiscal discipline resulting from Gramm-Rudman does make a difference.

THE FEDERAL BUDGET: OUTLAYS, RECEIPTS, AND DEFICITS

Despite growing revenues, the Federal Government has run a deficit in every year since 1969.

Revenues fell 2.8% between 1982 and 1983 due to the recession ending in 1982. Critics claim the Reagan-era tax cuts caused revenues to fall. But the tax rate cuts weren't fully implemented until 1984. The fact is, revenues have grown rapidly on the strong economic growth caused by Republican policies.

Revenues have grown an average of 8.6% per year since 1983, yet opponents of Republican economic policy continue to blame the deficit on not enough tax revenue.

The deficit problem lies squarely on runaway spending. Between 1975 and 1980, outlays grew 78%. From 1980 through 1985, outlays grew another 60%. Spending restraint was given a boost because of the discipline of the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings balanced budget act. Between 1985 and 1990, spending has grown 46%, far slower than the 10 years prior to 1985.

Much progress has been made on the budget deficit, which peaked in 1986. Our fiscal goal for further deficit reduction should be continued spending restraint.

THE FEDERAL BUDGET ADJUSTED FOR INFLATION

Growth in government is not just inflation—far from it. Real outlays grew 19% between 1975 and 1980; 22% between 1980 and 1985; and 7% between 1985 and 1990. The slowdown in growth reflects progress made from Gramm-Rudman.

During the same five-year intervals, inflation-adjusted revenues grew at different rates. Between 1975 and 1980, when inflation was clouding economic judgment and "bracket creep" was clobbering taxpayers, revenues advanced 24%. But the price of inflation was stagflation and recession. As a result, real receipts fell 10% between 1981 and 1983. They rebounded a strong 14% between 1983 and 1985. With an economy running full-steam-ahead, real revenues grew another 24% between 1985 and 1990.

The inflation-adjusted deficit peaked at $199.2 billion (1982 dollars) in 1983, a figure nearly reached again in 1986, which was the year of the largest nominal deficit.

THE FEDERAL BUDGET AS A PERCENT OF GNP

Since 1960, outlays have averaged about 21% of GNP. In every year since 1974, outlays have exceeded 21%. Since 1960, revenues have averaged about 18.5% of GNP. For eight of the past 11 years, revenues have exceeded that average. Clearly, this shows that excessive spending is the cause of the deficit.

The deficit as a percent of GNP peaked in 1983, at 6.3%. It has diminished steadily since then, reaching 2.9% in 1989. It will likely fall below 2.5% in 1990.

Republican economic policy in the 1980s created a record-breaking economic expansion, now in its 8th year. Strong economic growth permitted a growing Federal sector even though the Federal government's size relative to the whole economy has diminished in recent years. However, government's share of GNP is still larger than the post-1960 average.

FEDERAL SPENDING BY CATEGORY

Entitlements and mandatory spending has grown the most in dollar amounts, rising over $200 billion in the 1970s, and rising another $300 billion in the 1980s. By contrast, defense grew about $60 billion in the 1970s and another $170 billion in the 1980s. Entitlements and mandatory programs today are almost twice the size as defense. In 1970, entitlements were about four-fifths the size of defense.

Increases in entitlements and mandatory spending exceeded increases in defense spending in every year but two of the Reagan defense build-up years.

Financing deficits has caused interest payments to soar. Interest payments tripled in the 1980s.

Nondefense discretionary spending more than tripled in the 1970s, but grew just 11.7% from 1981 to 1989.

FEDERAL SPENDING AS A PERCENT OF GNP

Total outlays peaked at 24.3% of GNP in 1983, and are fallen to an estimated 22.1% in 1990.

Entitlements and mandatory spending peaked at 12.0% in 1983, and have fairly steady in the 10.5% to 10.7% range over the past four years.

National defense peaked at 6.5% of GNP in 1986, but levels much higher than that prevailed in the years prior to the mid-1970s.

Net interest is the only category to have steadily increased as a share of GNP during the 1980s.

GROWTH IN FEDERAL SPENDING

Growth in government has not been uniform among the categories over the years.

Net interest outlays have grown the fastest in each of the past three 5-year time intervals. Fortunately, that rate of growth slowed in the late 1980s, thanks to lower interest rates and smaller deficits.

Contrary to critics' complaints of the dominance of defense, growth in defense outlays exceeded entitlement outlays in only the 1980–85 interval.

In the last 15 years, entitlements and mandatory spending grew 273% compared to 243% for defense.

Discretionary spending skyrocketed during the Carter years and nearly halted in the early 1980s. In the late 1980s, it was the only category to have its growth rate increase. However, discretionary growth remained the lowest of all categories.

CHANGING BUDGET PRIORITIES

Interest payments doubled their share of the budget between 1970 and 1990.

Nondefense discretionary spending increased its share of the budget in the 1970s, and then lost ground in the 1980s.

Defense's share of the budget fell to 21.6% in 1980, then rose with the Reagan buildup, peaking at 26.7% in 1987. Since then, its share has fallen to an estimated 23.5% in 1990.

Entitlements and mandatory spending increased its share by 14.2 percentage points between 1970 and 1990, and accounts for just under half the budget in 1990.

FEDERAL RECEIPTS

Total receipts doubled in the 1980s.

A growing economy that created over 18 million jobs and raised personal income over 65% since 1982 naturally elevated Federal revenues.

Corporate and individual income tax revenues declined between 1982 and 1983 due to a recession, not because of tax rate cuts.

Since 1983, individual income taxes have risen $200 billion. Social Security payroll taxes have risen $175 billion.

Excise tax revenue has not changed much in the 1980s.

FEDERAL RECEIPTS ADJUSTED FOR INFLATION

From 1983 to 1990, total receipts have grown 41.3% after inflation.

From 1980 to 1990, total receipts have grown 33.4% after inflation.

Real total receipts during the 1975-80 expansion years grew 4.7% per year. In the post-1982 expansion, receipts have grown 5.1% with lower tax rates in effect. This shows that sound economic policies have contributed positively to our fiscal affairs.

RECEIPTS SHOWN AS A PERCENTAGE OF TOTAL RECEIPTS

Between 1970 and 1980, the share of receipts coming from Social Security taxes increase 7-½ percentage points, and another 5-½ points between 1980 and 1990.

The rapid rise in Social Security caused the relative size of other sources of revenue to fall. For example, excise and other taxes as a share of all receipts plummeted from 13.1% in 1970 to 8.1% in 1990, even though inflation-adjusted revenues increased $5 billion during those 20 years.

Individual income tax revenue has remained in the 45% to 48% range over the past 20 years, even though it grew 70%, or over $150 billion in real terms, during that time.

Corporate receipts in 1990 will be higher than either 1980 or 1970, even though its share has fallen from 17.0% to 10.4%.

Between 1980 and 1985, inflation-adjusted Federal outlays grew at a 5.0% annual rate. Between 1985 and 1990, inflation-adjusted outlays grew just 1.4% per year.

In nominal dollars, outlays grew an average of 9.9% per year from 1980 to 1985. Between 1985 and 1990, that annual growth rate was halved (4.8%).

The slowdown in Federal spending has been accompanied by a steady rise in revenues due to economic growth. This combination creates a "glide path" to a balanced budget without any need for tax increases.

If outlays after 1985 had grown at the same rate as the 1980-85 period, 1990 outlays would be about $1,517 billion, instead of the projected $1,197 billion—a difference of $320 billion! In inflation-adjusted terms, 1990 outlays would have been about $1,033 billion, instead of $912 billion (1982 dollars). In this light, the discipline encouraged under Gramm-Rudman has made a remarkable contribution to our fiscal affairs.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, this is not an academic exercise. It is simply to say that whatever is going to happen in that budget summit and events which follow is not yet at least on auto pilot; it is still up to us. If some of us who are concerned about this issue are willing to provide alternatives that cut Federal spending instead of raise taxes, that is still a viable alternative.

In fact, as the Senator from Mississippi pointed out, anyplace but Washington, DC, such proposals would be passed by overhwelming majority, in any kind of audience, Republican, Democrat, independent, in Mississippi, in Colorado, at the Rotary Club, the League of Women Voters, any church in America.

I do not think you could find, which I am sure is some consolation, an audience where you put the base proposition, shall we balance the budget by raising taxes or cutting spending to any group in America, probably some evenings, where you would not get a strong majority answer, "Cut Federal spending."

The question is, what is going to happen here? If you are a cynic and you just look at history, you will say, well, the fix is in. We are going to have a summit conference. That means a little less spending, a little more taxes, and some kind of cosmetic reform of the budget process.

But since I am not a cynic, I do not say that. I say the outcome is still in our hands, and there is no sense bellyaching about it later. Let us bellyache now and change the outcome.

Mr. President, I see no other Senator seeking recognition. I, therefore, suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

HATCH ACT REFORM AMENDMENTS OF 1989

The Senate continued with the consideration of the bill.

CLOTURE MOTION

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I send a cloture motion to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The cloture motion having been presented under rule XXII, the Chair directs the clerk to read the motion.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

CLOTURE MOTION

We, the undersigned Senators, in accordance with the provisions of rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, hereby move to bring to a close debate on S. 135, a bill to amend title 5, United States Code, to restore to Federal civilian employees their right to participate voluntarily, as private citizens, in the political processes of the Nation, to protect such employees from improper political solicitations, and for other purposes:

George Mitchell, John Glenn, Tom Daschle, Jim Sasser, Pat Leahy, Alan J. Dixon, Charles S. Robb, Paul Simon, Frank R. Lautenberg, Herb Kohl, David Pryor, Wendell Ford, Daniel K. Inouye, Dennis DeConcini, J.J. Exon, Bob Kerrey.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to withdraw the cloture motion that I just filed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, for the information of Senators, there will be no further rollcall votes this evening. The distinguished Republican leader and I have been discussing the pending legislation with the managers of the bill, and I have just filed a cloture motion, which if not withdrawn will ripen for a vote 1 hour after the Senate convenes on Thursday.

I have just obtained unanimous consent to withdraw that, which I intend to do tomorrow if we can work out an agreement with respect to the final disposition of this bill and amendments pending thereto. We have been working on that this evening with the managers and the distinguished Republican leader, and will resume that effort tomorrow.

I am pleased to yield now to the distinguished Republican leader.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, let me indicate to the majority leader, I hope we can have final disposition of this bill on Thursday. If that is the case, then there would not be any reason for a cloture vote. I think cloture will be invoked. We still have 30 hours and can offer germane amendments.

I understand on this side, there may be as many as four nongermane amendments being considered. I have not talked to each one of my colleagues who have those amendments. They may or may not offer those to this bill.

If one is offered tomorrow, for example, I assume the manager on the other side will wait for the cloture vote to ripen and if cloture is invoked, the nongermane amendment falls.

We then can offer germane amendments during the 30 hours preceding cloture.

But this will give us an opportunity to see how much we can do tomorrow. We do have a number of germane amendments. All we offered today were germane amendments. There has been no effort to frustrate the managers. We have had some little lapses of time.

The manager on this side, Senator ROTH, I believe, is prepared to start tomorrow morning. Senator MCCONNELL has a germane amendment. I will have a germane amendment. I think there are other germane amendments.

We would like to have a period of time between 11:45 and 12:15 to talk about campaign finance reform and introduce a bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I am certainly willing to accommodate the distinguished Republican leader and our colleagues.

The managers have indicated they would be prepared to be back on the bill about 10 o'clock tomorrow morning, so we can expect amendments to be offered and debate and discussion at that time.

We will tomorrow morning accommodate the distinguished Republican leader by setting aside the period from 11:45 until 12:15 for the introduction of the Republican campaign finance bill and the discussion related thereto at that time.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FORD). Without objection, it is so ordered.

MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there now be a period for morning business with Senators permitted to speak therein.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

TERRY ANDERSON

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise to inform my colleagues that today marks the 1,879th day that Terry Anderson has been held in captivity in Beirut.

With the hope that none forget what each hostage might daily endure, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point an article appearing in yesterday's New York Times which recounts the utter inhumanity of Frank Reed's captivity in Lebanon.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, May 7, 1990]

FREED HOSTAGE DESCRIBES HIS ORDEAL

(By Robert Pear)

WASHINGTON, May 6.—Frank Herbert Reed, the American hostage freed last week after more than three years in captivity, said today that he had been savagely beaten in the face, ribs and feet after he tried twice to escape.

"Thank God they didn't kill me," said the former hostage, who was the American director of the Lebanese International School in Beirut. He was kidnapped in September 1986.

At a news conference here with relatives of other hostages, Mr. Reed provided extraordinary detail about 43 harrowing months in captivity, an experience he described as "endless time."

Mr. Reed, 57 years old, asked, "Why was my nose broken, and why was my jaw broken and why was my face beaten?" He answered his question, saying, "Twice, I tried to escape from the clutches of Hezbollah, and twice obviously I was caught."

UMBRELLA GROUP FOR MILITANTS?

Hezbollah, or the Party of God, is widely believed to be the umbrella organization for groups that have taken hostages in Lebanon. The party is backed by Iran, and its members are fundamentalist Shiite Muslims who want to convert Lebanon into an Islamic state on the Iranian model.

Mr. Reed said he was hit more than 200 times in the head and body after the first escape attempt, the date of which he did not specify. After the second attempt, two days later, his captors jabbed him in the back with Kalashnikov rifles, and "my kidneys bled," Mr. Reed reported.

The kidnappers repeatedly struck his feet with metal rods of the type used to reinforce concrete, Mr. Reed said. As a result of this punishment, he said, "my feet have been slightly broken."

WAYS HE SURVIVED

"I have been lying on my back literally for three and a half years, chained either to a wall or a radiator. We were blindfolded 24 hours a day. We slept with our blindfold on because if we had any collateral with our keepers, we didn't want to lose it by letting them see our eyes."

Mr. Reed described the mental maneuvers and physical exercises he used to retain his sanity and strength. He said that other hostages—John McCarthy, a British television journalist, and Brian Keenan, an Irish teacher of English—were voracious readers and sometimes watched television.

But Mr. Reed said, "I—for whatever it is worth, and I am certainly no hero and I am not looking for any kind of recognition—I refused to read and refused to watch television as my protest that you're not going to entertain me while you're taking away something as precious as my freedom."

Mr. Reed was released on April 30, eight days after the release of Robert Polhill, a 55-year-old professor of accounting at Beirut University College. Sixteen Westerners, including six Americans, are still missing and assumed to be held in Lebanon.

Mr. Reed said that another hostage, Terry A. Anderson, appeared to be in excellent physical condition when he last saw him more than a year ago. Mr. Anderson, now 42, was the chief Middle East correspondent of The Associated Press when he was kidnapped in March 1985.

"ONE OF THEIR PET BOYS"

Mr. Reed said he was chosen by the kidnappers for harsh treatment. "I was one of their pet boys, their pet whackers," he said. "As a result, I spent over two years probably in solitary confinement by myself. I was often chained double when the others were chained single."

Soon after his escape attempts, Mr. Reed recalled, "I was in the toilet at peace with myself, I thought, and decided I would wash my jersey because it was rather filthy."

"I took off my blindfold and was washing away, and somebody hit that door open and I was staring at two Hezbollah. I was immediately taken into my cell and again beaten—I don't know how many times—in the face. Then my feet were beaten again to teach me a lesson."

About a year later, he said, "one pig of a man, who constantly haggled me and raggled me, broke my ribs, kicked my ribs on the right side, and I managed to somehow push them back."

Mr. Reed said he and the other hostages slept on thin foam rubber mattresses. He tried to maintain his strength by doing push-ups. At first, he said he could do only 6, but he worked up to 75 and once did "a record 103."

EXERCISE AS THERAPY

In the weeks immediately after his abduction, Mr. Reed said, he was "a layabout." He wondered idly about his family and friends and the school where he had taught. But he quickly realized that if he did not worry about himself, "there ain't going to be any Frank Reed." So he started his exercise regimen.

In addition, he said, he used the carbon from burned matches to draw a picture of his son on the back of the door to his cell. His captors could not see the picture when they opened the door. Likewise, he said, he drew a picture of his wife on the ceiling above his bed, and he was admonished for that. "But this is one of the ways that I had to kind of remind me, keep myself going," Mr. Reed said.

He spoke at length about "the Arab mind" and kidnapping as a form of vengeance in the Middle East. He said leaders had an "absolute duty" to negotiate with kidnappers if such talks were required to save lives. "What we want is our lives," he said, expressing irritation and impatience with "geopoliticians" who think they can stop terrorism by refusing to negotiate.

In a related matter, the Iranian representative at the United Nations, Kamal Kharazi, said today that the United States could show its gratitude to Iran for securing the release of Mr. Polhill and Mr. Reed, by encouraging Israel to free several hundred Arab prisoners. He made the comment on the ABC television news program "This Week."

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The following petitions and memorials were laid before the Senate and were referred or ordered to lie on the table as indicated:

POM-480. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

"ASSEMBLY JOINT RESOLUTION No. 7

"Whereas both the Public Employees' Retirement System and the State Teachers' Retirement System hold significant amounts of corporate bonds; and

"Whereas the incidence of leveraged buy outs is increasing in both frequency and size; and

"Whereas old debt as represented by existing bonds suddenly appears much more risky due to huge amounts of new debt caused by leveraged buy outs; and

"Whereas the buy outs tend to jeopardize corporate bond ratings in general and decrease their price, even those of corporations which are not targets of leveraged buy outs; and

"Whereas this process represents a debasement of previously high quality investment-grade bonds, reducing them to "junk bonds" virtually overnight; and

"Whereas various attempts to safeguard the bondholder who purchases corporate bonds in good faith have failed to provide needed protection; and

"Whereas the retirement benefits provided by the Public Employees' Retirement System and the State Teachers' Retirement System are of the "defined benefit" variety, which must, by law, be paid even if the retirement systems do not have sufficient funds to pay them; and

"Whereas it would be the taxpayers of California who would be called upon to meet those retirement obligations if a financial shortfall were caused by the above-mentioned effects of leveraged buy outs, or other causes; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of California respectfully memorializes the President and the Congress of the United States to amend federal law to require that the Securities and Exchange Commission determine and make public the following information concerning any proposed leveraged buy out:

"(1) Has any old debt been paid in full.

"(2) Does sufficient collateral exist to satisfy any remaining old debt.

"(3) Has a substantial portion of the old debt been paid and does sufficient capital or collateral exist to satisfy the remaining obligation; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Chief Clerk of the Assembly transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States."

POM-481. A resolution adopted by the Senate of the State of Minnesota; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources:

"RESOLUTION

"Whereas in the 1930's and 1940's, the Civilian Conservation Corps engaged in many public works including constructing public buildings; and

"Whereas many of these buildings are now considered historic buildings and quite a few of them are still in use in public parks such as Itasca State Park and other public areas; and

"Whereas the buildings are now fifty and sixty years old and in need of repair and restoration; and

"Whereas the cost of such an undertaking is great, but these buildings are important public resources and should at all costs be preserved as part of the American heritage: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, That it urges the President and the Congress of the United States to appropriate the necessary funds to aid in the restoration and preservation of the Civilian Conservation Corps buildings: Be it further

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate of the State of Minnesota is directed to prepare certified copies of this memorial and transmit them to the President of the United States, the President and Secretary of the United States Senate, the Speaker and Chief Clerk of the United States House of Representatives, and Minnesota's Senators and Representatives in Congress."

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mrs. KASSEBAUM:

S. 2585. A bill to amend the Food Security Act of 1985 to provide farm program payment fairness and equity to married couples when both the husband and the wife contribute active personnel management or labor to the operation of a farm enterprise, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

FARM SPOUSE FAIRNESS AND EQUITY ACT

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to provide farm program fairness and equity to married couples by correcting problems with current Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service regulations.

In my view, classifying spouses as one person, as under current ASCS regulations, can create serious inequities. For example, family members, except the spouses of farmers, can be eligible for separate payment limitations as long as they make a significant contribution of active personal management or labor. In some cases, spouses of farmers may inherit farmland far from the original farm but still be ineligible for a separate payment limitation. I find this very troubling, as many spouses of farmers contribute as much or more than other eligible family members. Mr. President, these problems indicate to me that current ASCS regulations are unfair.

Finally, this legislation also addresses a problem with payment limitation requirements relating to the Conservation Reserve Program. Under current regulations, a person who is receiving the maximum payment limitation and inherits land which is under a CRP contract cannot receive the rental payments from the inherited land. Given that land in the Conservation Reserve Program is under contract, I firmly believe that the owner of the land should receive the rental payments regardless of any payment limitation.

Mr. President, I would like to stress that this legislation is not intended to be a giveaway to farmers nor is it intended to provide more opportunities for abuse of current payment limitation requirements. The sole purpose of allowing spouses to be eligible for separate person status is to address the unfairness and inequity in current ASCS regulations.

By Mr. MOYNIHAN (for himself and Mr. D'AMATO):

S. 2586. A bill for the relief of the estate of Dr. Beatrice Braude; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

RELIEF OF THE ESTATE OF DR. BEATRICE BRAUDE

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise today on behalf of myself and Mr. D'AMATO to introduce a private relief bill for the estate of Dr. Beatrice Braude. Dr. Braude was dismissed from her employment at the U.S. Information Agency in 1953, and was subsequently unable to work for the Federal Government until 1982, when she obtained a part-time position with the CIA's language school. Dr. Braude spent years fighting her McCarthy-era dismissal as a security risk until her death on October 16, 1988. This bill takes no position on the merit of her estate's claim but would allow her estate to obtain a judicial hearing on the matter.

At the time of her dismissal, Dr. Braude was told that it was a result of budget cuts. After enactment of the Privacy Act of 1974, she obtained her personnel files and discovered that she was considered a security threat and was fired on the grounds of this unfounded suspicion. I would point out here that Dr. Braude had worked for the State Department as a Foreign Service staff officer and had been stationed at the American Embassy in Paris before going to work at the USIA. Imagine her surprise at being told she would receive a raise and promotion and then being fired only a day later.

When she discovered the real reason for her dismissal, in 1976, she filed suit when the U.S. Court of Claims to clear her name and obtain reinstatement and damages. A divided Court of Claims dismissed her suit as untimely under a 6-year statute of limitations. This bill would waive the statute of limitations and allow her estate to have a hearing on the merits of her claims.

I introduced similar legislation in the 100th Congress. Since then, sadly, Dr. Braude has died leaving her name still tainted by false accusations and slander. In brief, this bill merely grants Dr. Braude's estate a day in court to attempt to clear her name.

Dr. Braude's case is not new to the Senate. In 1979, Senator Javits and I introduced a similar bill which the Senate passed by voice vote. Unfortunately, the House of Representatives did not take action on this bill before the end of the 96th Congress.

Adoption of this bill will finally permit a citizen's name—one who devoted much of her life to Government service—the full protections of the law. I would note that Congressman GREEN of New York introduced similar legislation at the beginning of this Congress.

I ask that Dr. Braude's obituary be printed in the RECORD following these remarks. I also ask that the full text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2586

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. CONSENT TO SUIT.

Notwithstanding any statute of limitations, lapse of time, or bar of laches, the Court of Claims shall have jurisdiction to hear, determine, and render judgment upon any claim for back pay by the estate of Dr. Beatrice Braude against the United States arising out of the termination of Dr. Braude's employment at the United States Information Agency on December 30, 1953.

SEC. 2. RESTRICTIONS UPON SUIT.

Suit upon any such claim may be instituted at any time within 1 year after the date of enactment of this Act. Nothing in this Act shall be construed as an inference of liability on the part of the United States. Except as otherwise provided in this Act, proceedings for the determination of such claims, and review and payment of any judgment or judgments thereupon shall be had in the same manner as in the case of claims over which such court has jurisdiction under section 1491 of title 28, United States Code.

[From the Washington Post, Oct. 21, 1988]

BEATRICE BRAUDE, RETIRED PROFESSOR OF FRENCH, DIES

Beatrice Braude, 75, a retired professor of French at the University of Massachusetts and a former employee of the U.S. Information Agency who spent years fighting her dismissal as a security risk, died of cancer Oct. 16, at the Hebrew Home of Greater Washington in Rockville.

Miss Braude was fired from her USIA position as an analyst of French newspapers in 1953, shortly after joining the agency. She had previously been assistant cultural affairs director at the U.S. Embassy in Paris and a staff member of the State Department's Office of Research and Intelligence. She began her government service in Washington with the Office of Strategic Services during World War II.

At the time of her dismissal, Miss Braude was told she was being let go because of a reduction in force. Three years later a friend told her that USIA had described her to a prospective employer as a security risk, and a lawyer for the agency confirmed in subsequent legal proceedings that, in fact, she was fired because the agency considered her a security risk.

Miss Braude spent the rest of her life in an unsuccessful battle against that allegation. When she was young she had known another woman convicted of being a Soviet spy, and she was a member of a Washington bookstore that was suspected of being a gathering place for leftists. But a loyalty board and a State Department internal investigation had cleared her of being a security risk.

After the passage of the Privacy Act of 1974, she obtained the records of her federal employment and began legal proceedings to clear her name. The proceedings continued without resolution until her death.

During the 1950s and the 1960s, Miss Braude earned a doctoral degree in French from Columbia University and taught at several institutions of higher learning in New York City.

During the early 1970s, she worked for WGBH-TV in Boston. She later created and produced a radio program, "Tout en Francais," which was broadcast over station WFCR in Amherst, Mass.

She joined the faculty at the University of Massachusetts in 1974. She retired in 1981 and moved back to the Washington area.

Miss Braude was born in New York City and graduated from Hunter College.

Survivors include a brother, Theodore Braude of New York City.

By Mr. CRANSTON:

S. 2587. A bill to establish demonstration projects to provide direct services to homeless youth, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

HOMELESS YOUTH DEMONSTRATION PROJECT ACT

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, today I am pleased to introduce S. 2587, the Homeless Youth Demonstration Project Act of 1990. This legislation is designed to demonstrate the effectiveness of assisting private and public agencies in areas with heavy concentrations of homeless youth to work together to provide this vulnerale population with access to a system of comprehensive services.

Mr. President, homelessness is devastating for any individual, but it is even more acute for certain very vulnerable segments of the population. For young Americans it is an almost unbearable problem. Tragically, a large portion of the homeless population on our streets is now comprised of youth. We are seeing young people in our cities and towns without adequate food, shelter, health care, or financial support. In many instances these young people have histories of physical, sexual, or emotional abuse at home, or are simply the victims of gross neglect. Many have also been abandoned or forced out of their parental homes. There is little adult supervision or support, and, for most, the prospects for family reunification are extremely bleak.

Mr. President, almost every aspect of the lives of these troubled young people is in need of attention, whether it be their social, health, mental health, education, or employment needs. Unfortunately, due to serious underfunding of important Federal programs, the urgent attention is either not forthcoming or is available to only a lucky few. Nowhere is this more apparent than in areas which are inundated with a large number of homeless youth. In my State of California, the Los Angeles area is clearly one such mecca for homeless youth. While the statistics are hard to collect, an estimated 10,000 youth are on the streets in Los Angeles County at a given moment, and this number is estimated to swell to 20,000 during the summer months of July and August.

CALIFORNIA EXPERIENCE

In August 1988, the presiding judge of the Los Angles County Superior Court Juvenile Division convened a task force of public and private agencies to examine how to maximize and distribute better the services available to homeless youth in the Los Angeles area. The task force, in a report issued in December 1988, found an acute lack of drug detoxification facilities, mental health beds, health services, access to employment and education services, access to legal assistance, and access to programs that promote transitions to independent living. A comprehensive system of care, the task force concluded, was urgently needed. The task force specifically recommended "a coordinated policy including both public and private sectors and access to an array of programs which will meet a variety of needs" as the only way to respond adequately to the situation.

Mr. President, my bill is based on the excellent recommendations made by the Los Angeles task force. We are faced with the enormous challenge of making efficient use of scant resources. We need to fill gaps in certain services and prevent the duplication and overlapping of other services. We must knit together a comprehensive system of care so no young person falls through the cracks to be relegated permanently to the ranks of the chronically homeless.

EXISTING PROGRAMS

Mr. President, I have always been and will continue to be a strong supporter of programs authorized by the Runaway and Homeless Youth Act, title III of the Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act. The system of care that would be provided by my legislation would complement these existing programs. My bill would authorize $2.5 million for the purpose of establishing up to three demonstration projects in areas with high concentrations of homeless youth. Demonstration grant recipients would contract out with public and private agencies to provide services which would include medical, mental health, legal, educational, employment, social, and emergency services to homeless youth. Under the network, eligible youth would have access to programs funded under the auspices of the Runaway and Homeless Act, and in turn these programs could make other network services available to their charges.

Mr. President, the demonstration programs that would be authorized by this bill would also be subject to a stringent evaluation of the process, outcome and effectiveness of each project. It is my hope that upon demonstration of the projects' effectiveness in maximizing limited resources, other impacted areas will be able to institute similar systems of comprehensive care.

Mr. President, a network approach would ensure a more even delivery of services in areas with large numbers of homeless youth. It makes sense that each service program be part of a larger integrated system of care, rather than operating autonomously, and perhaps competing with other programs for scarce resources. The true winner in a network approach is the homeless youth who gets a full compliment of services, and, hopefully, an opportuity to reintegrate with society.

Mr. President, tomorrow morning the Labor and Human Resources Committee will hold a hearing on the Homeless Prevention and Community Revitalization Act, which was proposed by the chairman of the Labor Committee, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], who has been a tireless advocate of addressing the problems of homeless Americans. This bill complements my own National Affordable Housing Act, by providing funding for support services to the residents of public and assisted housing. My good friend from Massachusetts will also be introducing the Stewart McKinney Reauthorization Act later this year. I am very optimistic that as the committee moves forward with addressing the pressing needs of the homeless, my proposal in this area will receive favorable consideration.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of this legislation be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. STEVENS (for himself, Mr. GLENN, Mr. PRYOR, and Mr. SASSER):

S. 2588. A bill to amend section 5948 of title 5, United States Code, to reauthorize physicians comparability allowances; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

FEDERAL PHYSICIANS COMPARABILITY ALLOWANCE AMENDMENT

● Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, the Federal Physicians Comparability Allowance Act of 1978 enabled the heads of executive agencies to offer service agreements to certain categories of Government physicians and dentists in order to alleviate recruitment and retention problems experienced by the agencies. The allowance, which was reauthorized in 1979, 1981, 1983, and 1987, is used only where there are significant recruitment and retention problems, and the amount of the allowance is limited to the minimum amount necessary to deal with those problems. The 1987 revisions included increases in the amounts payable under the act. Currently, payments may not exceed: $14,000 per annum if, at the time the agreement is entered into, the physician has served for 24 months or less as a Government physician; or $20,000 per annum if the physician has more than 24 months of service. The act will expire September 30, 1990.

The Department of Health and Human Services, in a September 1989 study entitled "Physicians Comparability Allowance Program, An Analysis of Market Conditions and Utilization," reported that the 1988 turnover rate for physicians receiving the allowance was 5 percent. Information collected by the Office of Management and Budget as part of the fiscal year 1990 budget shows that in fiscal year 1988, 32 percent of nondefense physicians eligible for the physicians comparability allowance actually received an allowance; in fiscal year 1989, 35 percent of those eligible received an allowance. The average comparability allowance payment in fiscal year 1988 was $13,697, and in fiscal year 1989 it was $14,691.

It is also interesting to note that the average pay received by physicians in 1989, as reported by the American Association of Medical Colleges, was $136,900. By comparison, the average Federal physician receiving an allowance was paid $82,290 during fiscal year 1989. The maximum salary, for a GS-15 physician receiving an allowance, was $94,303. Even with the physicians comparability allowance, it is obvious that a significant disparity exists.

Mr. President, we must continue to attract and retain the very best physicians to the Federal Government. The best solution is to reform the Federal pay system to adequately compensate Federal employees and enable Federal agencies to compete effectively for the most talented candidates. Four bills are currently pending in the Congress to do just that; two in this body and two in the House. These bills would provide comprehensive reform of the Federal white collar pay structure, including physicians salaries. However, until such reform is enacted, the need persists to retain quality medical personnel in the Federal system.

The allowance paid to Government physicians has been an effective mechanism for achieving that objective. Therefore, I am submitting a bill today which will reauthorize the Physicians Comparability Allowance Act for 3 more years, through September 30, 1993.

I urge my colleagues to join with me in supporting and continuing this important program.●

S. 2590. A bill to amend title 10, United States Code, to authorize the appointment of chiropractors as commissioned officers in the Armed Forces to provide chiropractic care, and to amend title 37, United States Code, to provide special pay for chiropractic officers in the Armed Forces; to the Committee on Armed Services.

APPOINTMENT OF CHIROFRACTORS AS COMMISSIONED OFFICERS IN THE ARMED FORCES

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce legislation which would allow doctors of chiropractic to be appointed commissioned officers in the armed services.

Currently, some members of the health care profession including doctors of medicine, doctors of osteopathy, dentists, optometrists, pharmacists, psychologists, physical therapists, occupational therapists, dieticians, and physician assistants may serve as commissioned officers in the armed services. However, doctors of chiropractic, whose educational credentials match or exceed some of the above-listed groups, are noticeably absent from this list.

Commissioning doctors of chiropractic in the armed services would give our service members the opportunity to receive chiropractic treatment from persons specifically trained in this specialty. Further, commissioning of doctors of chiropractic would help to ease the current shortage of health care professionals in the armed services.

This legislation I am introducing today will serve to ensure that members of the armed services have a full range of health care services available. I am aware that some are opposed to the commissioning of doctors of chiropractic. I hope that introduction of this bill will serve to bring about a full discussion on this important issue. I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD immediately following my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. BAUCUS (for himself, Mr. GRASSLEY, and Mr. HOLLINGS):

S. 2591. A bill to amend title XVIII of the Social Security Act to provide relief from certain Medicare regulations relating to physicians' service; to the Committee on Finance.

MEDICARE PHYSICIAN REGULATION RELIEF AMENDMENTS

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I rise today with Senators GRASSLEY and HOLLINGS to introduce the Physician Regulatory Relief and Improvement Act of 1990. This legislation will lessen the burden that Medicare places on our Nation's physicians. Our bill is similar to legislation introduced by Congressman ROY ROWLAND and others last month.

Medicare is one of the most important Federal programs we have today. In terms of the effect it has had over the years in improving quality of life for its beneficiaries, Medicare has virtually no competition. For our Nation's seniors, Medicare has meant freedom from worrying about how to pay hospital and doctor bills.

But there is a downside to Medicare. More and more, physicians and patients across the country are becoming demoralized over the increasing amount of Government regulation in Medicare. In spite of all that is good about Medicare, it is rife with rules that benefit none and are a constant burr in the shoe of many. These nonsensical rules excessively burden our health care system and threaten to undermine the quality of care of which we are so proud.

Mr. President, increasing red tape—much of it unnecessary and sometimes even harmful—is the end result of a budget-driven system which substitutes short-term economic paper gains for long-term sensible health policymaking.

Excessive regulation is destroying the close personal relationship doctors have traditionally had with their patients. It's interfering with good medicine by denying procedures to patients which they request, and which physicians feel are needed. Red tape is inundating doctors with paperwork causing many others to withdraw from Medicare participation, making health care less accessible to many people. Even many prospective doctors are deterred by red tape, which is cited as a major factor in a 25-percent decrease in medical school applications over the past 5 years.

In a time when many parts of the country—including half the counties in my home State—are suffering serious physician shortages, this overzealous regulation can have very grave consequences for access to health care.

An article from a recent series in the New York Times on medical payment and practice changes in the 1980's captured the physician's perspective:

> The feeling of being shackled by rules and overseers is nearly universal among doctors today, experts inside and outside the profession say. Doctors say they are overwhelmed by paperwork, prohibited by insurance companies from doing procedures and subjected to scrutiny by group employers like health maintenance organizations that can even include scheduling of restroom breaks.

Mr. President, this bill is badly needed to reduce the regulatory burden that Medicare imposes on well-intentioned physicians who are respected by their patients but are always suspect in the eyes of Medicare. The changes we are proposing are few, and relatively minor, but together they can help restore an environment of faith and confidence that in the past has always characterized the country's health care system.

The legislation proposes the following changes:

To require the mandatory release of medical parameters and screens that are used to determine which Medicare claims might need individual review.

To prohibit Medicare carriers from charging physicians for information or documents that are reasonably needed to comply with Medicare statutory and regulatory requirements.

To allow physicians in solo practice and those in another group practice to cover Medicare patients for each other, and to allow the personal physician to bill for services provided by the covering physician.

To amend Medicare reconsideration and appeal requirements to allow State medical societies or other professional organizations to file actions on behalf of the entire class of aggrieved physicians.

To establish a physicians advisory group to review Medicare administrative requirements and their implementation prior to initiation of new policies.

Mr. President, I hope many of our colleagues will join me in this important effort. Our Nation's physicians, and all Medicare beneficiaries, deserve better than the maze of regulations they suffer under today.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be included in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2591

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

"HASSLES" IN THE MEDICARE PHYSICIAN REIMBURSEMENT PROGRAM

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I am pleased to be the primary cosponsor of a bill introduced today by my colleague from Montana [Mr. BAUCUS].

The bill in question is called "The Physician Regulatory Relief and Improvement Act," and its purpose is to relieve some of the truly unbelievable regulatory hassles to which we have subjected the practice of medicine.

In summary, it would:

Require the mandatory release of medical parameters and screens that are used to determine which Medicare claims might need individual review;

Allow attending physicians to bill Medicare for services provided to a patient by a professional colleague who is covering temporarily for the absent attending physician;

Prohibit Medicare carriers from charging physicians for information or documents that are reasonably needed to comply with Medicare statutory or regulatory requirements;

Allow State medical societies to file actions on behalf of an entire class of aggrieved physicians;

Establish a physicians advisory group to review Medicare administrative requirements and their implementation prior to initiation of new policies.

In my opinion, such legislation is long overdue. The Medicare program has become a regulatory nightmare, and is seen as such by virtually all who have anything to do with it.

As I am sure is the case for many of my colleagues, I receive a great deal of mail from physicians in my State complaining about the paperwork hassles they have to put up with in the program. One group of internists in my State complain that they routinely receive reimbursement rejection letters from their carrier, complaining that reimbursement forms are incorrectly filled out, although it subsequently becomes clear that they are not incorrectly filled out. They receive rejection letters requesting the wrong information or letters requesting that a claim be resubmitted on a part A health care financing administration form, even though, obviously, they have provided part B services. In the past, physicians have been required to tell patients that certain tests or procedures that they wish to use are medically unnecessary in the event that Medicare would not cover those services. The hassles connected with the unworkable MAAC program are notorious.

One of the physicians in my State wrote to me as follows:

Practicing medicine with ever-increasing Federal intrusion, regulations and bureaucratic stipulations has become worse than a nightmare. The confusion arising in Washington is abominable and is adversely affecting the quality of medicine practiced in this country. I find myself instead of reading and studying medical literature to keep myself current and abreast in the field of medicine now spending my time filling out forms, reading government directives, corresponding with Federal bureaucrats and studying information as to how to handle government edicts.

39-059 O-91-16 (Pt. 7)

Many will say so what, we can expect physicians to complain since they are the ones most directly affected by the way the physician reimbursement program works. And anyway, they say, they brought it on themselves.

The problem with this attitude is that the buredensomeness of Medicare regulations create a number of problems. Insofar as regulatory burdens cost money, that cost is liable to be passed on to other, non-Medicare payers and patients. Insofar as these burdens are particularly heavy for rural physicians due to the large share of their caseload represented by Medicare patients, they become once more disincentive to practice in rural areas. They may even discourage physicians from taking Medicare patients. We have already had one physician in Iowa essentially turn in his Medicare number and refuse to accept any more Medicare patients because of the hassles involved, and other physicians who have decided not to see any new Medicare patients.

But it is not only physicians who are complaining about the program, Mr. President. Beneficiaries are also frustrated. And one of the area agencies on aging in my State has undertaken a project designed to examine the way the program works and to see if something cannot be done about reducing the degree of regulatory hassle an dysfunctional outcomes characteristics of the program.

I do not want what I am saying to be construed as a criticism exclusively of the Health Care Financing Administration, the agency responsible for writing the regulations for the Medicare program, or the other organizations in the Medicare reimbursement pipeline, such as the peer review organizations and the Medicare intermediaries and carriers. No, indeed. There's plenty of blame to go around, starting right here in the U.S. Congress. Essentially, it was the Congress, for instance, that required physicians to inform their patients that certain tests or procedures were medically unnecessary.

In our search for budgetary savings, we now seem to require changes in the Medicare program on an annual basis. It is probably something of a minor miracle that the Health Care Financing Administration, and the other organizations involved, can keep up with the annual rejiggering of program requirements.

Nevertheless, if cost containment efforts will continue to be a part of the Medicare landscape, and who can doubt that they will be, we need to find ways to make the resulting program requirements bear down less cumbersomely on practitioners and beneficiaries. I hope that this bill might be a step in that direction.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleagues today in legislation to begin the reversal of a trend in Medicare regulation that greatly disturbs me. In our frustration at being unable or unwilling to control health care costs, we have instituted a number of measures—some through legislation and some through administrative procedures—that unduly burden physicians and confuse beneficiaries but provide no corresponding improvement in either cost or quality of care. This has transcended red tape and has taken on an increasingly punitive nature: we won't tell you what the rules are, then we can "getcha" when you violate them. This attitude only serves to punish those providers who are trying to deliver quality care at reasonable cost and leaves virtually untouched the few real villains. Further, it does nothing to enlighten beneficiaries and, all too often, creates impressions about the physicians that are totally incorrect at the precise time when confidence in that provider could do much toward improving the outcome of the illness.

Mr. President, I am told that the administration opposes this bill, that staff of the Health Care Financing Administration tells us release of medical parameters and screens to physicians and providing them documents at a reasonable cost would give them one up on gaming the system. I find this attitude appalling. We all know that an individual whose goal is gaming the system will find some way to do it, but the presumption here is that all physicians are guilty. We politicians should be particularly sympathetic to this situation, and I would hope would immediate remedy the matter if it applied to us. Suppose for a moment that we are not told the limits on political contributions, but the Federal Election Commission has an unpublished list of questionable contributors and a screen of dollar amounts beyond which the contribution would be subject to justification, but they will not disclose the names or the amounts. We would scream long and loud that we need to know the rules if we are to play by them and that we are too busy to be harassed in this manner. Among this body are those who push the limits, and that will assuredly always be true. But most of us are proud of our chosen profession and greatly resent the attitude that all politicians are crooks by nature. And this is exactly what physicians are saying—about refusal to disclose Medicare parameters and screens, excessive charges for documents needed to comply with statutory and regulatory requirements, and other methods devised to keep them ignorant of what is expected of them to participate in Medicare. I can only hope and believe that the attitude expressed by certain HCFA staff in this matter is not that of the new Administrator or the Secretary and that they will take aggressive action to disclose the rules so that honest, hard-working physicians can get out of the paperwork business and back to caring for patients.

The Physician Regulatory Relief and Improvement Act of 1990 will certainly not eliminate all the useless regulation currently imposed on physicians, but it does open up the process by addressing some of the more egregious offenses and moving us in the right direction. I recommend it for your consideration and hope for its expeditious passage.

By Mr. LUGAR (for himself, Mr. MCCONNELL, and Mr. MCCAIN):

S. 2592. A bill to implement United States policy toward El Salvador and to provide for conditions on assistance to El Salvador; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

EL SALVADOR PEACE, SECURITY, JUSTICE, AND DEMOCRACY ACT

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, I am introducing a bill which I believe will contribute to the end of the armed conflict in El Salvador. My bill is designed to put pressure on the principal parties involved to wind down the protracted conflict that has ravaged that beleaguered country for far too long. It also looks to a postwar transition period in which reconciliation and adjustment will take place throughout Salvadoran society.

The prospects for peace, economic growth and greater respect for human rights in El Salvador have never been better. With this in mind, I am submitting a bill that includes incentives and disincentives for all parties to cooperate in finding a path to reconciliation and peace.

There have been remarkable developments in furthering democracy and open markets throughout Latin America in recent years. These political and economic changes have not bypassed Central America. Indeed, they have been accelerated in the past few months. Panama and Nicaragua have both embarked on a new, exciting and challenging reversal of repression and backward economic growth in which the people of both countries suffered greatly. Now, more than any time in memory, an era of peace may be coming to the Central American region. We should aid and abet that prospect.

Nicaragua, Panama, Honduras, Guatemala, El Salvador, and Costa Rica have each made progress toward democracy over the past several years. But the internal conflict in El Salvador remains lethal and threatens to undermine the political progress that had taken place in the 1980's. Everyone knows that the pain and suffering of the people of El Salvador will not end unless there is an acceptable end to the internal conflict. Reform that is so desperately needed in El Salvador will not be possible until the internal conflict is ended.

The war in El Salvador must end, but it must end in a way that is acceptable to all parties. A solution must not create worse problems. U.S. policy should help set into motion the foundations and institutions for a more just society. But, it must not set conditions that allow the insurgents to shoot their way into power against a democratically elected government. It must provide incentives for compromise and for restraint by both parties to the conflict. It should be forward looking and yet mindful of recent events such as the murder of the six priests and their housekeeper and her child as well as the November military offensive by the FMLN as negotiations on reaching a cease-fire with the Salvadoran Government were about to commence.

With this in mind, Mr. President, the bill aims to do the following:

It articulates a series of foreign policy goals for the United States in continuing our assistance to El Salvador. These goals include promotion of democracy, human rights, judicial reform, peace negotiations through the intermediary role of the U.N. Secretary-General, separation of civilian police from the military command structure, strengthening of civilian authority, and the vigorous investigation of recent murders of Salvadorans.

The bill authorizes $85 million in military assistance for fiscal year 1991, but conditions this assistance on the performance of both the Government of El Salvador, including the armed forces, and the actions of the FMLN.

Specifically, U.S. military assistance funds would be divided into two tranches: no more than 60 percent of the $85 million would be available during the first 6 months of fiscal year 1991, with the remaining $35 million available after April 1, 1991. In addition, 20 percent of the first tranche and 40 percent of the second tranche would be placed in an escrow account in the U.S. Treasury. These escrowed funds would be available for furthering the process of reconciliation, repatriation, cease-fire monitoring, and the readjustments that would be required once the President determines that peace negotiations have been successfully completed.

However, the Government of El Salvador would receive no military assistance if it fails to: participate in good faith negotiations to end the conflict and support the intermediary role of the United Nations Secretary General; undertake a thorough investigation of recent murders in El Salvador; take steps to separate civilian law enforcement functions from the military command; or initiate steps to protect constitutionally guaranteed rights of the Salvadoran people.

At the same time, each of the conditions, including the placement of funds in escrow and the tranching of fiscal year 1991 military assistance funds, would be waived if the FMLN: fails to engage in good faith negotiations to end hostilities; fails to accept the intermediary role of the U.N. Secretary General; launches a sustained military offensive; fails to cooperate in investigations of murders of Salvadoran people; or continues to receive significant quantities of lethal military equipment from outside El Salvador.

Mr. President, these provisions place strong conditions on both the legal authorities and armed forces of El Salvador and on the FMLN. Both parties should know just what they need to do to help end hostilities and what actions would further the conflict and the fighting in El Salvador. The bill makes that clear.

The bill also contains a provision which would prohibit the expenditure of any U.S. military assistance funds without the prior approval of the democratically elected President of El Salvador. This provision reinforces and strengthens the role of civilian authority without, in my judgment, undermining the ability of the Salvadoran Armed Forces to meet its constitutional mandate for the defense of the country.

Finally, the bill authorizes $10 million in economic support funds for the purpose of actively promoting democratic processes, free and fair elections, human rights, an independent judiciary and more respect for human and civil rights.

Mr. President, I hope the United States can be helpful in bringing to a close the long nightmare of conflict and suffering in El Salvador. This bill is intended to contribute to that end.●

● Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. President, there is an expression familiar to all of us: Where there is a will, there is a way. Events, and individuals, in El Salvador seem to turn this expression on its head: No will, no way. No way will there be peace—no way will there be justice—no way will there be democracy. And that, Mr. President, is not what the citizens of El Salvador deserve.

For 10 years, El Salvador has been torn apart by a civil war that has spared no sector and no citizen. Schools, roads, health clinics, the country's entire infrastructure has suffered decline, damage and destruction.

But, I haven't come to the floor to point a finger of blame. Instead, I want to explain why I think the bill Senator LUGAR, Senator MCCAIN and I have introduced may offer a way out of the box we find ourselves in.

For years, we have tried to advance certain principles along with the democratic process, but the devastating loss of life and property along with the major offensive last December tell me something isn't working in our policy. I feel the time has come to come to terms with our mistakes and shift our policy emphasis if not our direction.

Extremism is the guts of the problem in El Salvador and armed extremism has paralyzed prospects for peace and prosperity. When I considered our options, my paramount concern was making clear my strong support for the democractically elected government of President Cristiani. Having observed that election, I was overwhelmed by the turnout in the face of FMLN threats, intimidations and their effectively shutting down all public transportation. There is no doubt in my mind, nor was there a single dissenting view in the delegation that I chaired, that the elections were open, fair and brought the people's choice to office.

President Cristiani deserves our support, but the people within the military and the guerrilla forces who choose to undermine his legitimate mandate with the ruthless use of terror and force must be stopped. I believe President Cristiani has the political will to reach a resolution to the crisis his country and people face, but his way is obstructed by individuals within the Salvadoran armed services. The shocking brutality of the murder of the Jesuits serves no democratic purpose, it serves the shortsighted agenda of a few power hungry traitors to their nation.

But my anger is not one-sided. In part, individuals in the military who have carried out acts of terror are responding to the political inflexibility and violent agenda of the FMLN. When the final toll is taken, who will judge whether using the desperate and poor civilians of San Salvador's barrios as a human shield against government forces is more or less offensive than the assassination of the Jesuits?

Mr. President, the cycle of violence has lasted too long and taken too many lives. While I am hopeful the U.N. mediated negotiations will produce a durable, meaningful solution to El Salvador's crisis, I believe we should demonstrate our commitment to peace and democracy with a new statement of our purpose and a new agenda of action.

The bill we are introducing today turns that policy corner. Pressure is exerted where pressure is needed, on the military to control abuses, on the FMLN to engage in the peace process and on the Government to participate in the cause of reconciliation and the building of a just society in El Salvador.

Mr. President, several years ago, I felt a similar combination of hope and despair when I examined the conflict in South Africa. At that time, against the views of my President, I introduced what eventually became the Comprehensive Anti-Apartheid Act. I was joined in that effort by Senators ROTH and DODD and believe that it was the bipartisan nature of the deep concern which brought about significant change in our policy.

El Salvador, closer to home, warrants the same commitment, concern and bipartisan solution. I hope my colleague will join us in paving the way for encouraging all participants in the conflict to find the political will to promote peace, democracy, and the justice each Salvadoran deserves.●

● Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, I accept the general thesis that U.S. assistance to any country, in addition to serving U.S. security interests, should encourage respect for American values. Those values, Mr. President, are reverence for life, for the rights of man, and for the political system that best serves these values—democracy. These values should be always the primary object of our support to other countries.

At a minimum, our assistance should support opposition to any extreme political element in the society we are aiding whose purposes are antithetical to our own. Whether these extremists are located to the far left or far right of the political spectrum, the United States must stand in opposition to their progress. We must neither suspend nor abridge our support for human rights and our opposition to forces whose cause is the subordination of the many to the few. We are a free people, and the promotion of that condition throughout humanity is our cause.

We are entering what may come to be called the new age of enlightenment. As much of the world adopts the values we have always served, let us take special care that in our relations with other nations we support, not impede, their continued ascendancy. Mr. President, I believe my support for conditioning United States military assistance to El Salvador is consistent with my support for our national values.

I am pleased to be an original cosponsor of the resolution introduced by my friend from Indiana, Senator LUGAR. It was designed to encourage respect for democracy and to promote a peaceful resolution of armed conflict in El Salvador. This resolution has no other purposes. It does not seek to promote military solutions over political solutions to Salvador's problems. It does not take the crimes of some terrorists more seriously than the crimes of others. This legislation does not distinguish between right wing terrorists and left wing terrorists. It has no double standards. It is intended only to aid the great majority of Salvadorans in the struggle to impose their sovereign will, as expressed in five free elections, over all extremists who would deny them their freedom.

This legislation recognizes Salvador's great progress toward building a sound democracy. Yet, we are not blind to the persistent attempts of some Salvadorans to subvert that democracy in the interest of personal empowerment and enrichment. We recognize the legitimacy of the democratically elected Government of El Salvador. We recognize that the legitimate Government of El Salvador has long struggled with a grave military threat from the Communist terrorists of the FMLN. But we recognize also, that some other elements in El Salvador have added to the bloodshed of this awful conflict to settle their personal scores and to impose their own antidemocratic persuasion on the rest of the country.

What we are witnessing in El Salvador is an alliance of terror between the FMLN and the death squads that has brutal consequences for the rest of the country. The rest of El Salvador—from President Cristiani to the leftist politicians who participate openly in Salvadoran democracy, from the children of government officials to the children of campesinos, from the neighborhoods to which the FMLN has brought war and terror to the humble altars of the church where service to mankind is repaid with torture and murder—the rest of El Salvador is trapped between the twin creeds of the extreme left and right. The creeds that teach their adherents to express themselves politically with violence. The creeds that preach contempt for human life. The creeds of the FMLN and the death squads.

By introducing this legislation, we seek to discourage these extremists from further torturing their country. We seek to hold El Salvadorans accountable to the same standards of decency. Further, we hope to contribute to the process of reconciliation in El Salvador. We are mindful that United States policy should enhance the prospect of a peaceful resolution of the Salvadoran conflict, not remove that prospect further from realization. And we understand that if debate in Congress on our involvement with El Salvador succumbs to the temptations of reflexive partisanship, then we will make peace in El Salvador even more elusive than it is already.

Mr. President, our legislation conditions military assistance to El Salvador on the government's good faith participation in peace negotiations and the acceptance of U.N. mediation. It is conditioned on a professional and thorough investigation of recent murders for which elements of the military are alleged to be responsible. It is conditioned on further democratic progress in El Salvador. We insist that the separation of police functions from the military begin immediately and that the constitutional rights of the Salvadoran people be protected. Also, Mr. President, we seek to strengthen civilian authority in El Salvador by requiring that the democratically elected President of El Salvador give final approval to the use of military assistance funds.

The resolution represents absolutely no weakening of United States support for the Government of El Salvador's resistance to the Communist insurgency. But it does recognize that challenges to lawful government in El Salvador do not all originate in the cells of the FMLN. We hope to use our aid as a vehicle to stiffen resistance to all of these challenges, while at the same time supporting the peaceful settlement of Salvadoran fratricide. For these reasons, this legislation directs that some of the funds marked for military assistance be placed in an escrow account to be used for the purpose of reconciliation should a peace agreement be concluded.

Mr. President, this resolution is an expression of hope for El Salvador. It does not indicate U.S. weariness for the cause of liberty in that troubled country. We are faithful to our commitment to that just cause. Our solidarity requires that we be evenhanded as we help Salvadorans build a free society. We must hold all elements of Salvadoran society—the government, the armed forces, the FMLN—to the same standards of justice and simple human decency. If one party rejects these conditions, then the other parties will not be obliged to observe them.

The FMLN will also be expected to professionally and thoroughly investigate human rights abuses for which it is allegedly responsible. Moreover, we have not forgotten the FMLN's past cynical practice of participating in peace negotiations while preparing to launch another offensive. This resolution wisely waives conditions on U.S. military assistance should the FMLN engage in this practice again or prepare to do so by receiving large arms shipments from outside the country.

By remaining carefully balanced and fair in this good faith effort to advance the cause of peace and democracy in El Salvador, I would hope that we have encouraged balanced and fair consideration of our resolution. As I have stressed before, it is imperative that we avoid signaling El Salvador that we are divided in our support for peace and democracy there. I cast no doubt on anyone's sincerity as they offer proposals to help Salvadorans attain the better life they deserve. What concerns me is that we will let out honest differences cause us to lapse into another partisan foreign policy contest. We would risk encouraging Salvadoran extremists to associate themselves with the success or failure of our various efforts. And should one side prevail in Congress, will that victory be interpreted as U.S. approval for one variety of terrorism over another? Surely, we can all agree that our efforts should have better consequences than this horrible prospect envisions.

Let us work together for the benefit of El Salvador. Our history is defined by our long support for liberty and our defense of human rights. Let us add to that great history by not overlooking the desperate struggle of this small nation. Let us not reward the savagery of the FMLN and the death squads. Their purposes are antithetical to ours and we must not unwittingly serve them. We must not perpetuate the suffering of Salvadorans. We must help them maintain their rightful place in the community of free nations. We must endure the trials of the moment and stay focused on our only objectives—the success of liberty and peace in El Salvador.●

By Mr. BRADLEY (for himself, Mr. REID, and Mr. LIEBERMAN):

S. 2593. A bill to reduce the amount of lead contamination in the environment; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

LEAD BAN ACT

● Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, it is a fact that very low levels of lead contamination are known to be dangerous. It's time to reduce the threat of lead and legislation I am introducing today, with Senators REID and LIEBERMAN as cosponsors, tackles headon what is now an unacceptable threat to many, many people in our society—most notably, our children.

I have long sought to reduce our exposure to lead. In 1985, evidence of lead contamination in drinking water in New Jersey led me to introduce legislation which banned the use of lead solder in drinking water systems. This legislation, which became known as the Lead Ban, was signed into law in late 1986.

Mr. President, in recent years, the evidence of a health threat at very low exposures to lead has become well documented. The Center for Disease Control [CDC] is now examining the need to lower the definition of elevated blood lead levels below the current level of 25 micrograms of lead per deciliter [μg/dL]. I am informed that CDC is likely to lower the threshold to the 10–15 μg/dL level within a year.

Lowering the CDC threshold is consistent with actions recently taken by the Environmental Protection Agency [EPA]. EPA's Clean Air Scientific Advisory Committee recently concluded that "blood lead levels above 10 μg/dL clearly warrant avoidance, especially for development of adverse health effects in sensitive populations." The National Institute for Environmental Health Services has conclusively shown that adverse behavioral effects on the fetus and child begin with blood levels of 10–15 μg/dL; they may even be present at lower levels.

To understand how dramatic this change will be, it should be noted that the median lead levels in all children in the United States is estimated at around 7 μg/dL. Lead poisoning should not be considered as a problem confined to inner-city areas. Many children all over the United States will be over the threshold.

Sadly, the younger the child, the more serious is the potential damage from lead. According to CDC, even low levels of lead in young children result in decreased intelligence as well as developmental and behavioral disturbances. A report in the New England Journal of Medicine noted in January that having high lead exposure led to a sevenfold increase in the risk of nongraduation from high school, and a sixfold increase in the risk for reading disability. And these effects occurred in children who showed no obvious symptoms of lead poisoning in childhood.

Mr. President, lead enters the environment—and our children—from many sources. It's not just the paint chips; it's not just drinking water—although either of these can be particularly harmful. All lead exposure is additive. As the threshold for dangerous exposure is lowered, basically any of a number of avenues presents a problem.

Lead exposure is a complex problem: lead is in the water we drink, in the air we breathe, and in what we eat. This legislation will deal with lead in a comprehensive fashion. Kids in our Nation shouldn't have to drink lead, breathe it, or eat it. And that's my goal. Here's my plan:

ELIMINATE LEAD IN OUR WATER SUPPLY

First. Make sure all States are following through on the 1986 lead ban: EPA has no documentation on who has complied. We need to know who is following through and who isn't.

Second. Strengthen the lead ban:

Permanent labeling or color coding of lead solders to prevent inadvertent use of lead solders by homeowners or illegal use on the job site is too easy. Lead and nonleaded solders look too similar.

Further restrictions on lead in the brass alloy that make faucets and fittings. The lead ban allows continued use of 8 percent lead alloys in fittings and faucets. The New Jersey school testing program confirmed that faucets are in fact a major source of lead contamination. EPA will be required to perform a technical evaluation of the safety of these alloys and make recommendations on a new standard.

REDUCE OR ELIMINATE LEAD IN THE AIR

First. Ban lead in gasoline in urban areas immediately and nationwide in 2 years. An exemption would be provided for farm vehicles. Nearly 10 percent of the gasoline sold nationwide contains lead. Over 1 million pounds of lead is still going out the tailpipe yearly.

Second. Reduce lead in the waste stream: Increasingly, our solid wastes are incinerated. Lead, when incinerated, can enter the air and water. My bill would:

Ban lead in product packaging—with a 4-year phase-in. Lead pigments are still used in many printer inks. Substitutes are widely available.

Require EPA to develop a program for 100 percent recycling of lead storage batteries—for example, car batteries; 78 percent of the U.S. lead production of 2 billion pounds goes into storage batteries. Industry claims an 80 to 90 percent recycling rate. Anything less than 100 percent is unacceptable. My bill calls for grants to the States to close the loop on lead in batteries; 200 to 400 million pounds of lead shouldn't disappear every year. And, the grants program is paid for by a 5-cent-per-pound fee—roughly $1 per car battery.

STOP EATING LEAD

First. Ban lead in food processing and cans. Over 1 billion food cans are still marketed with leaded solder seams. This number is down 80 percent since 1985, providing substitutes are widely available. It's time to eliminate lead in the cans. Additionally, lead has been used in the past in chemical compounds applied to foods. For instance, lead arsenate has been used as a maturing agent in citrus fruit. Lead compounds should not be applied to foods.

Second. Ban lead in cosmetics. Certain cosmetic products—notably some types of imported eyeliner—have traditionally contained lead. Certain hairsprays and hair colorings contain lead acetate. Consumers need products that are lead-free.

Third. Require new standards and increased testing of lead in ceramic ware. You can have a pitcher that meets existing standards, yet when left holding orange juice overnight can give a kid in one 8 oz. glass 625 micrograms of lead, or 6 times what we have said is the maximum allowable daily intake. We import nearly 1 billion pieces of ceramicware. In 1987, only 811 were tested. And of these, 16 percent exceeded the guidelines. In a well-documented case of lead poisoning, a middle-aged woman was nearly killed by habitual use of an illegal, poorly glazed coffee mug.

Fourth. Reduce the risk from lead paint through research and new techniques. Leaded paint, which was not banned for residential use until the early 1970's, remains a huge reservoir of lead that flakes and weathers and settles into soils or our rugs and furniture. Removal of the threat has to be done in a way that's cost effective and efficient. Right now, we're working with age-old chemical or mechanical stripping techniques. We need to update this technology. We need to identify when lead paint is not a threat. We need a strategy and a message for the many millions of homeowners who will have to face the problem. A $30 million, 3-year EPA research program, with the possibility of grants to States or localities is justified and overdue.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have the text of my bill printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. MOYNIHAN:

S. 2594. A bill to establish a national program to identify contaminated sediment in the Great Lakes and in coastal waters and to restore the quality of these sediments; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

GREAT LAKES AND COASTAL SEDIMENT ASSESSMENT AND RESTORATION ACT

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I present today along with my distinguished colleague, Senator SYMMS, to the Senate for its consideration a bill entitled "The Great Lakes and Coastal Sediment Assessment and Restoration Act." A long name for a bill that addresses a complex subject.

This bill will be the first serious effort to address the matter of sediment contamination. Such sites have been identified in a number of States, although very little has been done about them. In a few, cleanups have been planned, but none has progressed very far. The sites that have received attention have been treated as Superfund cases. In large part, the structure of Superfund is unsuited to underwater contamination, and no cleanup has been done.

To get these sites cleaned up, we must determine the extent to which sediment pollution problems are present and may be affecting water quality in the Nation's lakes, rivers, harbors, and other water bodies. We have a lot to learn. To date, there have been no comprehensive survey of contaminated aquatic sediments.

The problem is staggering given the historic use of our waterways as disposal areas. The United States has 39.4 million acres of lakes, 1.8 million miles of rivers, 32,000 square miles of estuaries, 23,000 ocean coastline miles, and hundreds of thousands of square miles of near-shore, Continential Shelf habitat. Even if only a small percentage of these have polluted sediments, and we suspect many do, we will need a major effort to correct them.

More than any other, one serious problem has obstructed attempts to deal with contaminated sediments. This is, what to do with contaminated material once it is found. Do we move it? Try to treat it in place? Leave it alone? The truth of the matter is we just don't know. To fill the gaps in our understanding, this bill proposes to establish a program of research and development for the management of contaminated sediments. We have the ability to do these things. We have made some progress toward the understanding of toxic waste sites on land. Let us do the same for those under water.

Mr. President, the Clean Water Act has set standards for ongoing toxic pollution discharge into our waters. The Superfund Program and its site designation system has focused on direct human health hazards on land. Unfortunately, neither deals directly with the problems caused by contaminated sediments, and neither helps to document or mitigate them. Many standards exist for acceptable water quality, but none are in place to define unacceptable sediment quality. Our bill would correct this situation by directing the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency to develop sediment quality criteria and standards.

With the start of industrialization, the simplest and most common method of disposal for any particular industrial waste product was to dump it into the nearest body of water. Out of sight was truly out of mind, and this has left us with an unknown number of underwater slag heaps.

The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers and the Environmental Protection Agency need to develop guidelines for sediment restoration. Once those guidelines are established the Corps should be directed to implement restoration techniques on identified projects. The Corps has a long history of maintaining the harbors and channels and it would not seem unreasonable that while conducting maintenance work, the Corps addresses contaminated sediment problems as well.

Mr. President, contaminated sediments can be cleaned up. This is a worthy effort and one we ought not delay.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill and a section-by-section analysis be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS—THE GREAT LAKES AND COASTAL SEDIMENT ASSESSMENT AND RESTORATION ACT

SECTION 1—SHORT TITLE

The "Great Lakes and Coastal Sediment Assessment and Restoration Act."

SECTION 2—PURPOSE

Sets out the five principle goals of the bill:

(1) establish a program of research and technology development for management of contaminated sediments;

(2) provide for a comprehensive national survey of contaminated sites;

(3) direct the EPA to develop sediment quality criteria and standards to clearly identify sediments that are contaminated;

(4) direct the EPA and the Corps to develop guidelines for sediment restoration projects; and

(5) direct the Corps to implement contaminated sediment restoration projects in certain areas.

SECTION 3—DEFINITIONS

Defines the terms "coastal waters", "Great Lakes", "contaminant", and others.

SECTION 4—NATIONAL SEDIMENT CONTAMINATION TASK FORCE

To coordinate federal efforts on contaminated sediment, the bill established a National Sediment Contamination Task Force made up of the EPA, the Corps of Engineers, NOAA, the Fish and Wildlife Service, the U.S. Geological Survey, and the Department of Agriculture.

The Task Force shall have ex officio membership consisting of three of more representatives of Great Lakes and coastal states, three or more representatives of Great Lakes and coastal ports and harbors, and three or more environmental organizations.

The EPA Administrator and the Assistant Secretary of the Army for Civil Works shall co-chair the Task Force.

SECTION 5—SEDIMENT SURVEY AND MONITORING

Subsection (a) is taken from Senator Moynihan's bill S. 1210, and would direct the EPA to make a comprehensive national survey of sites with contaminated sediment. EPA would report to Congress after 2 years.

Subsections (b) and (c) grant EPA general authority to further monitor and identify sites of sediment contamination.

SECTION 6—SEDIMENT RESTORATION RESEARCH

The EPA and the Corps of Engineers are directed to investigate the nature and behavior of sediments, the effects of sediment contamination on water quality, aquatic life, and human health, and possible methods for management of contaminated sediments.

SECTION 7—SEDIMENT CRITERIA AND STANDARDS

The EPA is directed to develop criteria for determining sediment contamination. These criteria would be translated into specific sediment quality standards for various contaminants identified by the Administrator. Standards would be set to "assure the protection of human health, and the protection and propagation of a balanced indigenous population of fish, shellfish and wildlife, and provide for recreation in and on the water." Once issued, these standards would apply to any sediment remediation project.

SECTION 8—SEDIMENT RESTORATION GUIDELINES

Based on the research carried out pursuant to sections 5 and 6, and the standards developed pursuant to section 7, the EPA and the Corps of Engineers will develop specific guidelines for restoring or otherwise managing contaminated sediment. In developing these guidelines, the agencies must consider at least the following techniques:

(1) removal of contaminated material and disposal at an upland site;

(2) removal of contaminated material and disposal at an aquatic site;

(3) in place management of contaminated material, including capping, solidification and other methods of stabilization;

(4) chemical treatment of contaminated material;

(5) biological treatment of contaminated material; and

(6) thermal destruction of contaminated material.

For each of these methods, the guidelines must describe the best technology available, practices to minimize environmental impacts, the expected period of effectiveness, and the costs. The EPA and the Corps are to revise the guidelines as new information and technology become available.

SECTION 9—SEDIMENT RESTORATION PROJECT IDENTIFICATION

This section identifies two sets of projects for which funding will be available.

Subsection (a) provides that, for any project undertaken by the Corps of Engineers for navigation dredging in US ports and harbors, the Corps must test the sediment to be dredged to determine if it exceed standards issued pursuant to sectrion 7. If contamination is found, the Corps shall determine the degree of contamination of the sediments within 2500 feet of the proposed dredging. The Corps' work on the navigation channel shall be enlarged to remove or otherwise manage contaminated sediments in the adjacent area.

Subsection (b) provides for the selection of 5 non-harbor areas to demonstrate innovative sediment restoration techniques. These sites will be chosen by the EPA and the Corps at a rate of one per year. One site is to be Onondaga Lake, New York, and the others must be within the waters of the US coastline or the Great Lakes.

SECTION 10—SEDIMENT RESTORATION PROJECT STATEMENTS

Before any sediment project may go forward, the Corps, in consultation with the EPA, must prepare a Sediment Restoration Project Statement. Along with a specific description of the project to be carried out, this Statement must identify other options considered and rejected, why such options were rejected, and possible sources of ongoing sediment contamination, and what existing Clean Water Act authority could be invoked to assure that sediments will not be re-contaminated.

Once a Project Statement is prepared by the Corps of Engineers, the EPA Administrator and the Governor of the State in which the project is located each have 90 days to review the project. If neither party raises an objection, the project may proceed.

SECTION 11—CONTAMINATED SEDIMENT ACCOUNT

This section amends the Internal Revenue Code to create a Contaminated Sediment Account within the Harbor Maintenance Trust Fund, and specifies that 8 percent of the money deposited in the Trust fund shall be credited to the Contaminated Sediment Account. (It is expected that the Harbor Maintenance Fee will be raised from 0.04 percent to 0.125 percent. Eight percent of 0.125 percent is 0.01 percent.)

In addition, this section amends the Water Resources Development Act of 1988 to specify that sediment restoration projects developed pursuant to the Great Lakes and Coastal Sediment Assessment and Restoration Act are eligible to be funded out of the Contaminated Sediment Account of the Harbor Maintenance Trust fund.

SECTION 12—INTERGOVERNMENTAL COORDINATION

This section specifies that:

(1) sediment projects shall be considered a federal activity for the purpose of the state certification under section 401 of the Clean Water Act;

(2) States are not limited from setting standards more strict than federal standards; and

(3) new authority created by this bill does not limit the authority for remediation of contaminated sediment under Superfund.

SECTION 13—AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

All authority refers to expenditures from the Contaminated Sediment Account. Authorizes $2 million to the EPA for the National Contaminated Sediment Survey, and $10 million for other activities.

Authorizes $10 million to the Corps for research, and such sums as are available in the Contaminated Sediment Account for sediment projects.●

By Mrs. KASSEBAUM:

S.J. Res. 308. Joint resolution to designate the month of June 1990, as "National Huntington's Disease Awareness Month"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL HUNTINGTON'S DISEASE AWARENESS MONTH

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. Mr. President, I am pleased to introduce a joint resolution designating next month as "National Huntington's, Disease Awareness Month."

More attention is needed for Huntington's, and this joint resolution will help promote better education about this rare disease. Huntington's disease is a fatal, hereditary, neurological disorder afflicting 25,000 Americans. At present, there is no cure for Huntington's disease, and an additional 125,000 Americans remain at risk.

Persons affected by Huntington's require total personal care in the later stages of the disease, very often resulting in financial devastation for the entire family. However, recent advances in the field of molecular genetics have enabled scientists to define the approximate location of the Huntington's disease gene, giving victims and their families renewed hope.

We need to continue to support such developments. In 1983, Congress passed the Orphan Drug Act, which has led to the development and marketing of vital treatments for rare diseases such as Huntington's. As an original sponsor of the Orphan Drug Act, I have a particular interest in seeing that our efforts against rare diseases do not flag.

Mr. President, I urge all of my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring this joint resolution, and, I would ask unanimous consent that the text of the legislation be printed in the RECORD:

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 308

Whereas 25,000 Americans are victims of Huntington's Disease, a fatal, hereditary, neurological disorder;

Whereas an additional 125,000 Americans have a 50 percent chance of inheriting the gene responsible for Huntington's Disease from an affected parent, and are considered to be "at-risk" for the disease;

Whereas tens of thousands of other Americans experience the destructive effects of the disease, including suffering from the social stigma associated with the disease, assuming the difficult role of caring for a loved victim of the disease, witnessing the prolonged, irreversible physical and mental deterioration of a loved one, and agonizing over the death of a loved one;

Whereas at present there is no cure for Huntington's Disease and no means available to retard or reverse the effects of the disease;

Whereas a victim of the later stages of Huntington's Disease invariably requires total personal care, the provision of which often results in devastating finanical consequences for the victim and the victim's family;

Whereas recent advances in the field of molecular genetics have enabled scientists to locate approximately the gene-site responsbile for Huntington's Disease;

Whereas many of the novel techniques resulting from these advances have also been instrumental in locating the gene-sites responsible for familial Alzheimer's Disease, manic depressaion, kidney cancer and other disorders;

Whereas increased Federal funding of medical research could facilitate additional advances and result in the discovery of the cause and chemical processes of Huntington's Disease and the development of strategies to stop and reverse the progress of the disease;

Whereas Huntington's Disease typifies other late-onset, behavioral genetic disorders by presenting the victim and the victim's family with a broad range of biomedical, psychological, social, and economic problems; and

Whereas in the absence of a cure for Huntington's Disease, victims of the disease deserve to live with dignity and be regarded as full and respected family members and members of society; Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the month of June 1990, is designated as "National Huntington's Disease Awareness Month", and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling on the people of the United States to observe such month with appropriate programs, ceremonies, and activities.

By Mr. BIDEN (for himself and Mr. THURMOND):

S.J. Res. 309. Joint resolution designating the month of October 1990 as "Crime Prevention Month"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CRIME PREVENTION MONTH

● Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce a joint resolution designating the month of October 1990 as "Crime Prevention Month."

A companion resolution has been introduced in the House by Congressman DAVID PRICE. Mr. President, this joint resolution has the support of the National Crime Prevention Council. The council has organized the 130-member Crime Prevention Coalition, which also supports the resolution. The coalition's membership includes the Justice Department's Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the National Governors' Association, the U.S. Conference of Mayors, and State crime prevention associations.

The National Crime Prevention Council and local and State crime prevention groups will organize and implement a variety of educational and recreational activities to raise public awareness about crime prevention during the month of October. These activities will include organizing neighborhood watch programs and instituting drug abuse curricula in schools.

In my own State, New Castle County organizes more than two dozen different programs to prevent crime. Law enforcement officers teach children bicycle safety. One program, "Sergeant Sam," takes a robot to elementary schools and shares a variety of safety tips with young students. Adults receive safety tips, too—about guns, property identification, home and office security, and rape prevention. Special programs have also been designed for senior citizens and entire neighborhoods.

The commemoration of October as "Crime Prevention Month" will also help highlight current National Crime Prevention Council programs, including Community Responses to Drug Abuse; Teens, Crime and the Community; Youth as Resources; and Teens as Resources Against Drugs. These programs pull together local residents and local law enforcement agencies, businesses, and churches to help educate local communities about crime prevention techniques. In 1989, the council trained 500 crime prevention specialists and community organizers. These specialists will, in turn, train many concerned citizens in crime prevention techniques.

Mr. President, 1990 also marks the 10th anniversary of the award-winning crime prevention campaign of McGruff, the Crime Dog. The McGruff campaign is designed to teach children and adults crime prevention techniques. The campaign teachers children about the dangers of drugs and how to avoid possible dangerous situations. The McGruff campaign provides adults with information on securing their homes and guidelines to follow when developing neighborhood watch programs.

The McGruff campaign's success was illustrated during a Brookfield, CT, Police Department investigation of a child sexual assault case. The investigators discovered that the only person the 5-year-old victim would talk to was McGruff, the Crime Dog, who had visited the boy's school several times. The State attorney's office agreed that any disclosures made to McGruff would be admissible in court and that McGruff would be allowed into the courtroom if the boy had to testify. McGruff, the Crime Dog, and the McGruff campaign are currently recognized by 99 percent of children, 94 percent of teens, and 75 percent of adults.

Mr. President, it is my hope that "Crime Prevention Month" will highlight the current crime prevention efforts in our communities and help promote a productive relationship between our law enforcement agencies and local residents.

The purpose of this joint resolution is to promote current crime prevention techniques and to develop innovative programs aimed at reducing the level of crime in our cities and towns. I invite my colleagues to join me and Senator THURMOND in this effort to promote effective and innovative crime prevention techniques.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the joint resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was order to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 309

Whereas it has been proven that community crime prevention efforts are reducing victimization by crime and helping to rebuild a sense of mutual responsibility and shared pride in community;

Whereas the National Citizens' Crime Prevention Campaign, featuring McGruff the Crime Dog and promoted by the United States Department of Justice, the National Crime Prevention Council, the Advertising Council, and the Crime Prevention Coalition, helps spur diverse local partnerships among law enforcement agencies, citizens, businesses, and government which work to reduce crime and improve community life throughout the Nation; and

Whereas the 10th anniversary of McGruff the Crime Dog as a symbol of the Nation's fight against crime and drugs will be celebrated in October 1990: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the month of October 1990 is designated as "Crime Prevention Month," and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe such month with appropriate programs, ceremonies, and activities.●

By Mr. CRANSTON (for himself and Mr. MURKOWSKI):

S.J. Res. 310. Joint resolution to designate June 25, 1990, as "Korean War Remembrance Day"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

KOREAN WAR REMEMBRANCE DAY

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, as chairman of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs I am introducing today, on behalf of myself and the ranking minority member of the committee, Mr. MURKOWSKI, Senate Joint Resolution 310, a joint resolution to designate June 25, 1990, as "Korean War Remembrance Day."

The 25th of June is an appropriate day to recall the Korean war and honor its veterans. Forty years ago on that day, in 1950, the Communist army of North Korea invaded South Korea, igniting the Korean war. For the first time in history, a United Nations command was created. With the United States as the executive agent and main participant, the U.N. command thwarted the invasion.

Many have called the Korean war America's forgotten war, but those who served and their families have never forgotten. Likewise, our Nation should never forget those who fought and died in Korea for the cause of freedom. Almost 6 million American servicemen and servicewomen were involved directly or indirectly in the war, and the freedom and independence they ultimately ensured for the South Korean people came at great sacrifice. American casualties during the 3 years of active hostilities totaled 54,246 dead—of which 33,629 were battle deaths—and 103,284 wounded. Over 300 prisoners of war have never been accounted for.

Mr. President, the value of their sacrifice has never been more in evidence than now, as we witness the power of democracy to break down walls that have far too long divided the peoples of the world. Senate Joint Resolution 310 is one tangible way of honoring the service and commitment of those who endured the rigors of combat and the extremes of a hostile climate under the most trying conditions and still prevailed to preserve the independence of the Republic of Korea.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 128—RELATING TO CONDITIONS IN BURMA

Mr. MOYNIHAN submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

S. CON. RES. 128

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring),

SECTION 1. FINDINGS.

(a) HUMAN RIGHTS AND DEMOCRACY IN BURMA.—The Congress finds that—

(1) the people of Burma continue to be ruled by an unelected military government that does not govern by the consent of the people;

(2) the Burmese Government has violently suppressed prodemocracy demonstrations, killing or imprisoning thousands of demonstrators and forcing others to flee for their lives;

(3) the Government of Burma has pledged to hold free and fair elections in Burma on May 27, 1990;

(4) despite this commitment—

(A) thousands of persons connected with the prodemocracy movement remain imprisoned, and the government continues to arrest opposition figures engaged in peaceful political activities;

(B) independent human rights monitors report that the Burmese authorities have continued to engage in abuses against civilians that include rape, torture, extrajudicial execution, and forced porterage;

(C) prominent civilian leaders who might represent a significant electoral challenge to the military regime's monopoly of power have been imprisoned or placed under house arrest and prevented from standing for elections; and.

(D) the State Law and Order Restoration Council has announced a set of national election campaign restrictions that provide the authorities with nearly unlimited discretion to restrict free and open debate on political issues;

(5) despite these obstacles to a free and fair election, the presence of impartial international observers both prior to and during the elections in Burma would signal the international community's strong interest in democracy in Burma, and might encourage fairness and help ensure that accurate judgments are made about the integrity of the electoral process; and.

(6) economic and military cooperation between the Government of Burma and other foreign governments, including arms sales and cooperation with Burmese troops operating in border areas, has strengthened the position of the military regime, and has helped enable it to restrict the process of political reform and continue its abuses of human rights and haumanitarian law.

(b) ILLICIT NARCOTICS PRODUCTION AND TRAFFICKING IN BURMA.—The Congress also finds that—

(1) Burma is the largest producer and exporter of illicit opium in the world, with narcotics production nearly doubling since the current military regime came to power in September 1988;

(2) increases in narcotics production since September 1988 have been faciliated by a Burmese Government practice of accommodation and cooperation with major narcotics producing and trafficking organizations;

(3) this accommodation with drug traffickers has helped enable the Government of Burma to direct military energies and resources against opposition groups challenging the government, resulting in a wide range of human rights abuses;

(4) almost all United States-supported antinarcotics efforts in Burma were suspended in September 1988;

(5) a recent report by the United States General Accounting Office determined that the results of the United States-supported antinarcotics program in Burma prior to September 1988 had been seriously deficient;

(6) this report found that the current political situation in Burma precludes a resumption of United States antinarcotics programs; and

(7) a resumption of United States antinarcotics assistance at this time would be interpreted as a slackening of the United States Government's opposition to the repressive nature of the current Burmese regime and the widespread abuse of human rights carried out by that regime.

SEC. 2. POLICY STATEMENTS.

(a) ELECTIONS IN BURMA.—The Congress calls upon the Government of Burma to establish the conditions necessary to ensure free and fair elections by taking actions to—

(1) release all persons imprisoned or otherwise restricted for the peaceful expression of their views;

(2) permit all Burmese citizens committed to peaceful participation in the political process the opportunity to contest the elections;

(3) lift electoral campaign restrictions that provide the authorities with nearly unlimited power to limit free and open debate on political and economic issues;

(4) end the involvement of the State law and Order Restoration Council in the formulation and administration of electoral regulations, and establish for that purpose an impartial election commission that had independent authority to establish and administer election rules; and

(5) permit access to Burma for international election observers, including those associated with intergovernmental as well as nongovernmental organizations concerned about human rights and political reform.

(b) RESPECT FOR BASIC HUMAN RIGHTS IN BURMA.—The Congress calls upon the Government of Burma to demonstrate a commitment to basic human rights by taking action to—

(1) abandon martial law restrictions on the right to a fair trial and provide all persons charged with crimes with access to lawyers and family members, adequate time to prepare defenses, and the opportunity to have cases heard by imparial tribunals; and

(2) end the practices of rape, torture, extrajudicial executions, and forced porterage of civilians, and order thorough investigations of reports of abuses and pursue prosecutions against those believed to be responsible.
